

BW 369

.II 5

Dr. Dixon on Popery,

1839.

70

BW369
II 5

Wesley Memorial Library

Thursfield Smith Collection of Wesleyana

Atlanta, - Georgia

Wes 1399

LETTERS

ON THE

DUTIES OF PROTESTANTS

WITH REGARD TO

POPERY.

BY JAMES DIXON.

SHEFFIELD :
G. CHALONER, MARKET-PLACE.

SOLD BY J. MASON, 66, PATERNOSTER-ROW, AND 14, CITY-ROAD, LONDON.
1839.

PRICE ONE SHILLING.

BW 369
II 5

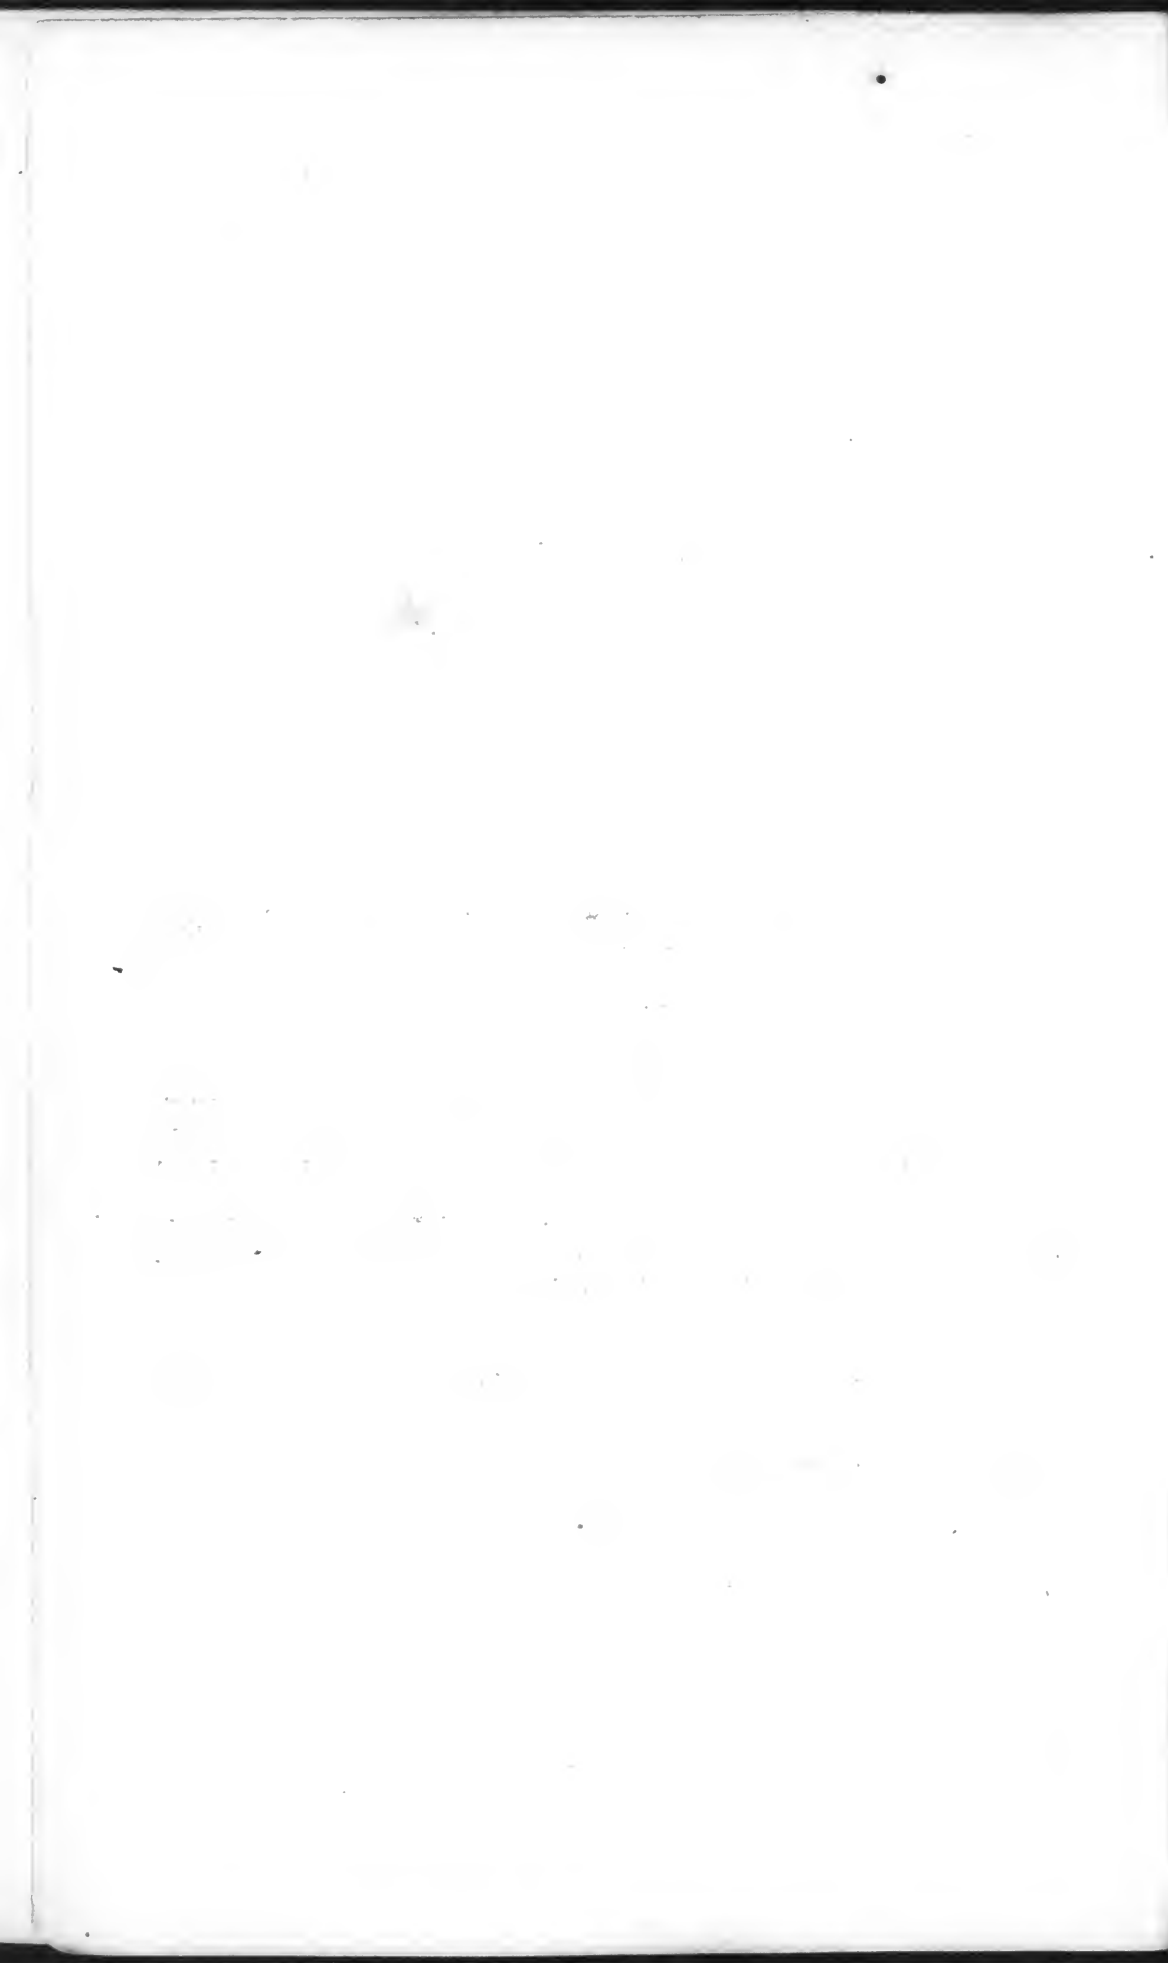

Wes. 1399

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE following Letters—with the exception of the last—were first published in two or three Provincial Newspapers. The object of the writer was limited to a desire to create some local interest in the place of his residence, on a question, which he deems of transcendant importance to the religious and social well-being of the community, and of the world.

Various friends having expressed an opinion that good would arise from a more general circulation, they have been rescued from the fugitive form of publication in which they first appeared. If, in the midst of the excitement of the times, any, even the least possible attention should be produced—especially in his own religious community—on a subject which is likely, sooner or later, to come home to their bosoms and their homes with tremendous importance, the Author will be amply satisfied.

Sheffield, Oct. 19, 1839.

THE DUTIES OF PROTESTANTS WITH REGARD TO POPERY.

LETTER I.

THE question, "Is Popery on the increase?" is often proposed. The answer varies with the politico-religious creed of the parties making it; the liberal invariably arguing that it is not unnaturally increasing, and the adherent of old English principles as firmly maintaining that its advances are fearfully rapid, and equally dangerous.

Another question of equal importance demands the serious consideration of all parties interested, viz., What are the sentiments of the different classes, constituting the religious world, and the body politic?—or in other words, What is now the hue, tone, and gauge of the morale of the question regarding Popery?

A revolution of sentiment always precedes any great external changes in either religious or civil society. If the same feeling prevails now, as existed when the Stuart race was driven from the throne, because of their adherence to Popery, and the Brunswick dynasty was founded on purely Protestant principles; if the same indomitable resolution to spurn a foreign, priestly, and tyrannous dominion exists, which led to the affirmation of the nationality of the English Church, and laid her foundations in principles eternally hostile to the claims of the Papacy; and if the same spirit predominates amongst Nonconformists, which led them to dissent from the Episcopal Church, because it did not remove far enough from Rome; then in the prevalence of this pure, national, and Protestant spirit, the country is safe, and may bid defiance to the new crusade of Popery against her noble bulwarks of freedom and religion.

The supreme importance of a living Protestant feeling, sufficiently deep, strong, and vigorous, to resist the encroachments of the enemy, is now most apparent; because it is evidently the only power, next to the truth, on which we have to rely. The time of penal enactments has passed away. The Popish Priest is no longer a recusant in law, and the mass-house a proscribed temple of idolatry. Popery has been admitted into the precincts of Parliament, and invested with the rights of legislation ; the door is open to high military, civil, and judicial employments ; and in all respects, as a religious system, it is now more than tolerated,—it is fostered and endowed.

The policy of the great measure of Emancipation is not now under discussion, but it will be recollected by the reader, that on the removal of legal safeguards, moral ones were confidently resorted to, as being sufficient. On a prima facie view of the enactments of that period, it is most evident, that it was the intention of the legislature to maintain the ascendancy of the Protestant religion, as by law established. Two sources of moral influence were then depended upon as the basis of security. First—the improved and altered state of the Romanists themselves ; and secondly, the enlightened, sound, and religious mind of the British people.

It had long been held by all Protestant writers and legislators, that the well known dogma of the Romish Church, “ that faith was not to be kept with heretics,” still constituted an integral part of the creed of all Papists, and that consequently they could not be bound by an oath. This many of their writers flatly denied. Evidence was taken on the question, by one or more committees of Parliament ; the sentiment was indignantly repelled ; and it was affirmed again and again that respect to the sanctity of an oath kept the proscribed and maligned people from the honours and emoluments of power ; for had they not been bound by a scrupulous regard to religion and truth, it was only necessary for them to forswear themselves, and they would be at liberty to enjoy them all.

Trusting to these representations and promises, the legislature, so far as the Papists were concerned, relied on their conscientiousness, sense of honour, religious feeling, and improved morality, and placed the stability of our Protestant institutions on the sacredness of an oath. Whether this moral obligation, this solemn appeal to God, and this conventional and final arbitration of all differences betwixt man and man, has proved sufficient to bind the consciences of the disciples of the Church of Rome, we shall soon see. One of two things is certain, either that the authors of the emancipation measure did honestly and seriously intend to bind the consciences of Romanists to abstain from all efforts to injure the Protestant Church ; or, otherwise, proposed the oath as a mere trap and expedient to beguile the British public into their measure. Some suspicion as to their sincerity, indeed, arises out of their present silence. The authors of the measure have lived to see its operation. The act is not an old, antiquated piece of legislation, the meaning of which is obscure, and only dimly to be guessed and deciphered by the learned in the law. Sir Robert Peel still lives. He can tell the world, in his place in Parliament, which of the alternatives above stated is the true one. If he intended the oath in question to operate so as to prevent Popish members from taking part, by vote or otherwise, in injuring the Protestant Church, how is it that he does not vindicate his own measure ? This very oath was relied upon as the security of the Protestant Church, and yet, when the Deity is insulted—the holy bible profaned, and an act of Parliament, of which that Right Hon. gentleman is the author is torn to the winds, in his presence, not a word is uttered ! Why, if this solemn appeal to the Gospels means any thing but a mockery, was the Bishop of Exeter left almost alone in his proposition on this subject ? Though his facts, his reasoning, and his eloquence remained unanswered, and unanswerable, yet his motion was left to fall to the ground. When will statesmen learn that an eternal barrier exists between truth and falsehood, and that the only solid foundation of useful legislation and personal honour is, an uniform and inflexible adherence to the one, and avoidance of the other? To avert a pressing difficulty, it was thought expedient, by those who in their judgments and consciences considered emancipation to be wrong, to concede that measure. To avoid some other inconvenience, it is now thought expedient to abandon the only security for Protestantism proposed by that measure. When and where is this expediency to stop? There is now a mighty pressure on the Irish Church: will it be deemed expedient to leave her to her fate? An impartial spectator would conclude that, if it was thought necessary to abandon the ramparts on which it was originally intended to fight the battles of Protestantism, viz., the Emancipation Act, it was also intended to give up the citadel. If there is meaning in words, and such a thing as truth in the world, it was intended by that act to guard our Protestantism against the aggressions of Popish cupidity by the oath inserted. Why is not the question tried on this ground? Why allow the question, regarding the spoliation of the Church, to be directly decided by its enemies? Why not first determine who are the lawful jurors to give the verdict?

It is argued, by the Irish members, that the Protestant interpretation of the oath is an abridgement of their freedom as legislators. No doubt it is, and so every honest man in the world would consider it to be intended. Is there any thing extraordinary in this? It has long been a settled constitutional principle that the Protestant form of Christianity shall be the established religion of the land, whilst, at the same time, Popery is in all respects, excluded from that high eminence. Are not all our institutions settled on this foundation? Our gracious Queen holds her right to the throne on this tenure. She is not at liberty on the question of religion. Her ancestors accepted the Crown of these realms on the stipulated condition, that they should profess and sacredly maintain the Protestant faith. If the princes of the Brunswick line choose to change their faith, and go over to Rome, they are bound, on their solemn oath, to renounce all claim to the throne of these realms. The Stuart race, if any of them are living, are unquestionably the heirs to the British Crown, in case that Crown is worn in subserviency to his Holiness the Pope. At the settlement of the question, at the period of the Revolution, it was the resolute purpose of the English nation that the throne of this country should not be held as a fief of Rome, but rest on a national basis of independence. The noble spirits of those days spurned with resolute indignation the notion of being governed by the puppets of a priestly despotism, misnamed Kings of Great Britain. They knew by the experience of all ages that their civil freedom must perish, their dearest rights be invaded, and their property drained to support, in pampered pride, a herd of political priests, who only made religion the pretext of earthly power and grandeur; and they came to the resolution that they would only be governed by a Sovereign, who would repudiate the dominion of this foreign despotism, and respect the nationality of the country in her religious, as well as civil rights.

Here then we have the principle in question most clearly defined. It is of the essence of the British constitution to preserve Protestantism as the religion of the nation. The highest functionary of the State, we see, holds her right on this express condition of being, personally, a professor of the Protestant faith, while she also abjures Popery, and swears fealty to the altars of the Protestant Church. Whilst the genius of the constitution thus guarded the throne against Popish intruders, up to the period of the Relief Bill, it did the same with the other two estates. That measure was of the nature of a concession; but in order to preserve the Protestant religion in security, it was required, on oath, that the Popish members of Parliament should exercise no power inimical to the faith and property of the national religion. The following is the oath taken by Popish members;—

“ I do swear, that I will defend, to the utmost of my power, the settlement of property within this realm, as established by the laws; and I do hereby disclaim, disavow, and solemnly abjure any intention to subvert the present Church Establishment, as settled by law within this realm; and I do solemnly swear, that I never will exercise any privilege to which I am, or may become entitled, to disturb or weaken the Protestant religion, or Protestant Government in this kingdom; and I do solemnly, in the presence of God profess, testify, and declare, that I do make this declaration, and every part thereof, in the plain and ordinary sense of the words of this oath, without any evasion, equivocation, or mental reservation whatever.”

How has this provision of the law been respected by the Romanists themselves, and in what spirit and manner has the enactment been upheld by the Parliament and the nation? In answer to the first branch of the question, it is sufficient to state, that every measure, which has had for its object the spoliation of the Protestant Church, has received the advocacy and votes of nearly all the Popish members. The celebrated appropriation measure, having for its purpose the robbery of the Irish Church, has ever been the foster child of O'Connell and his brother Papists. The oath they had taken never stood in their way for a moment. From the period of their entrance into Parliament to this day, they have not failed to employ their utmost energies to render abortive every effort to settle the law of Tithes; and to render their exertions successful, the recess of every session has been employed in getting up an agitation.

These movements of the popular mind have not been in vain. The law has been interdicted in the hands of the judges. The officers of justice, in the execution of their duties, have been assailed, brutally beaten, and in many cases massacred on the spot. The unoffending ministers of religion have been deprived of their rights, their families reduced to beggary, and driven from their houses; while great numbers of their flocks have perished by the brutal hand of the assassin. In addition to all that has already been done, the Papists now make no secret of their future plan of operations. They tell us plainly that their object is the restoration of their corrupt and tyrannic Church to a state of ascendancy, not only in Ireland, but also in England. Facts agree to this threat, and this country is the selected theatre in which Popery, in these modern times, is destined to try her strength. Her avowal is no empty and bombastic boast. The proclamation of her claims, the extent of her plans, the anticipation of her triumphs, are boldly proclaimed, and an agency in Parliament, and a Jesuitical priesthood throughout the country, are seen to operate with vast ability, undying zeal and determined perseverance on the plan laid down.

All this is taking place, let it be recollected, in despite of the oath of the parties. Away, then, with the childish notion that the improved state of Popery will be a safeguard of our Protestant institutions and liberties. We have here a demonstration "clear as truth of Holy Writ," that faith is not kept with heretics. Can the gentlemanly character, the elevated position, the legislative functions, the great numbers, and the notoriety and audacity of this perjury, alter the moral aspect of the evil? Truth is no respecter of persons. The boundary line betwixt good and evil is not marked out by a conventional compact. Resolute defiance of all the human enactments embodying Divine truth, cannot annihilate the truth so embodied. The rampant swearing on the part of the Popish members, that they will do nothing to impair the Protestant Church, as they enter the doors of Parliament, when in truth they immediately take measures to destroy it, though supported by a thousand subtle evasions, cannot lose its aspect of profanity and perjury in the sight of man, or be annulled in its obligations before the throne of God. On the evidence of Roman Catholic ecclesiastics and laymen, before Committees of Parliament; the petitions for the redress of grievances; the published opinions and avowals of persons in authority; a kind of compact, tacit, and well understood by both parties; the letters of Mr. Eneas O'Donnell, himself a Papist, and Secretary of the Catholic Association; as well as from the speeches of the gentlemen who conceded Catholic Emancipation,—it is most clear and certain, that the oath propounded to Romanist members was intended to bind them from taking any measures in their legislative capacity against the Protestant Church; and in fact, to place the security of that Church, so far as the Papists are concerned, on the sanctity of this oath.

How dreadful the scene opened to our view by this violation of so sacred an engagement! It indicates much more than a total disregard of the rights of the Protestant people of this country; though that is, of itself, sufficiently heinous. To deceive a large community of men, by glozing professions, hypocritical pretences, a seeming candour, a false and affected liberality, and a thousand avowals that the obnoxious tenets of their Church were not understood in a vulgar, but a refined and modernized sense; and then for the same men to falsify the whole, is sufficiently base. Yet this is not the worst portion of the case. It argues an utter destitution of moral principle. To speak of that rectitude, honour, benevolence, and truth, which originate in the influence of religion, would in this place be beside the mark: but surely we have a right to expect the natural and conventional virtues to be respected. But instead of even this poor and sapless virtue, we are presented with a state of moral turpitude, which only the Papacy, with its complicated machinery of evil, could produce on the susceptible mind of fallen man.

We are, in this instance of wickedness, presented with the shocking aspect of the acknowledged leaders of the majority of a nation violating the most solemn engagements, and supported and countenanced in the crime by their united suffrages. "The evil tree bringeth forth evil fruit;" and it is impossible to avoid the conviction that the moral feelings of the whole body of Papists are most awfully depraved; how otherwise could they unite to support and vindicate a known, palpable, and open falsehood?

But the whole is in perfect keeping with the dogmas of their Church. In all this they are treating with a nation considered by them as heretics; and it turns out that faith is not to be kept with such persons. It is evident from this case, that the impure and rotten doctrines of their corrupt community have produced their genuine results. We have millions of men belonging to this Church, who, being trained by a jesuitical casuistry in the art of deception, resolutely maintain that black is white. Even the patriotic affections of human nature are all perverted; the foundation of a conventional intercourse is sapped and shaken; the sentiments of religion turned into poisonous rancour and fraud; whilst the confidence which ought to be exercised by a community living under the same social compact, is transmuted, on the one part, into distrust, and on the other into deception.

The ecclesiastical services of the Popish Church are fair and splendid; but when their doctrines are analyzed, they are seen to be anti-christian and false; and when the morals of its disciples are tested, they are found to be like the fabled apples of Sodom, specious to the eye, but crumble to dust in the hand. Surely nothing can now be hoped for, by the people of this country, from the improved morality of the Popish Church. This fallacy deluded many of the staunch supporters of the Catholic claims. They trusted in the altered state of things in the community, to be enfranchised and elevated to power. The dream that the increased light, liberal spirit, and religious improvement of the age, has entered the precincts of the Papacy, and wrought a wonderful revolution of moral sentiment, must now vanish. The notion of modern statesmen, that the religious opinions and feelings of a people, whether true or false, must sink in abeyance to the love of civil freedom, the advancement of economical schemes of improvement, physical comfort, and patriotic love of country, are proved by this one fact to be the speculations of "false philosophy." Man is seen in this instance to have lost none of his instincts and none of his vices. He must either be a superstitious or a religious creature. The constitution of his nature, and the scenery around him, inevitably impel him to seek the truth, or in the desperation of his fears to cling to its substitute and shadow. The empty theories of modern free-thinkers have laid this consideration out of view, and deemed it sufficient to present the Irish Papists with the full-blown blessings of the British Constitution, to secure their abandonment of the absurdities of their superstition, and insure their devoted fealty to the national good. It now turns out, however, that these persons prefer their superstition to their country, or to freedom. They are the genuine children of human nature. Infidel France is now rapidly veering round again to Popery, and a few years, unless prevented by the dissemination of evangelical doctrines, will see that interesting people bowing at the old shrine of Popery, with as much ardour of devotion as was ever manifested by their ancestors. If the sceptics and semi-sceptics of this country possessed an understanding capable of conviction, they might learn, both by the case of France and Ireland, that their worldly and godless system is no remedy for the evils of Popery.

In this state of things it would be perfect madness, on the part of Protestants, any longer to calculate on security from any danger from Popery itself. No doubt the advocates of Emancipation imagined, that, as soon as the barriers of law were removed, and the Popish population were admitted to power, they would at once co-mingle with all other subjects of these realms for truly national purposes; considering their fealty to the nation, which had dealt fairly and honourably with them, to be transcendantly above any allegiance they might owe to a foreign priestly despotism; and that the sense of gratitude, the fine play of patriotic feeling, together with a vastly improved state of religious sentiments, would be instantly brought about by that healing measure, and the whole Popish population of this country would enjoy their spiritual freedom and political rights in peaceful, loyal, and happy tranquility. It has turned out otherwise. The new power placed in their hands is employed solely for Popish purposes. The nation is nothing; Popery is, with them, every thing. The blending of interests, the amalgamation of all differences, the common pursuit of equal and united objects, the silence of the war-whoop of discord, the free and happy enjoyment of religious privileges, though held under different professions, so confidently anticipated;—are all now found to be so many beautiful chimeras. Popery, it is now seen, can endure no rival. The institutions and interests which are found not to quadrate with her haughty claims, are marked out for destruction, and her advanced position is held solely with the purpose of springing to the consummation of her object;—the domination of her power, ecclesiastical and political. The statesmen of the age might know, if they chose to consult the page of history, that in every period she has invariably made her religious hierarchy subservient to political purposes, and her spiritual system the means of advancing her temporal dominion. If at this day the only points of controversy were the doctrines of Christianity, no one need fear the result. But it has ever been the policy of Popery to twist her creed and her claims around the civil and political institutions of society, as the ivy round the oak, till, by the deadly pressure of her odious exactions, the power, freedom, and happiness of the nations have been weighed down, and lost in the ecclesiastical tyranny. This is the scheme of this crafty foe of the rights of nations and the liberties of men, at the present moment. True to her Machiavelian policy, she scruples not at the means to be employed. An essential and unalterable despotism in her own constitution and assumptions, we behold her planting herself by the side of every form of human government; blandly intermingling her wily dogmas with every variety of opinion; disseminating the poison of her creed in every new vehicle of literature and science; whilst, ever and anon, she is seen to prop up the throne of the despot, and to shout for freedom with the tumultuous mobs of democracy.

LETTER II.

IN my last letter I called attention to the moral state of the Popish Church, and showed that no dependence ought to be placed in their honesty and sincerity, on questions involving the interests of Protestantism. I now propose to show that an implicit reliance is not to be placed on mere worldly politicians. It would, indeed, be invidious to suppose any thing like a parallel in the two cases; and yet, acting chiefly, it is to be feared, on mere expediency, the cause of Protestantism has been most woefully betrayed by this class of men.

The first proof of this shall be taken from the principles involved in passing the Roman Catholic Relief Bill. The charge of inconsistency, and betrayal, is not alleged against those persons who were of opinion that the measure in question was, in itself, right ; but against the party who, holding opposite sentiments, could so dispose of principle, conscience, and religion, as to lend themselves to a measure which they avowed to be, in their judgment, at the time, not merely an uncertain experiment, but a dangerous innovation on the Protestant constitution of the country. Now that men of high rank, commanding influence, great talents, and official power, could be induced to swerve from the cherished and oft-avowed doctrines of their whole life, on a subject so vital, is the matter of complaint.

The charge against them is not that of changing their opinions. Any person has a right to adjust and alter his views on any question, either of public or of private interest, and none but the most narrow-minded would blame him for such variation, in case it was adopted on conscientious and enlightened conviction. Many of the most enlightened statesmen, grave and learned jurists, zealous philanthropists, as well as orthodox and evangelical divines, long entertained the belief that Emancipation was in its own nature just, and in its results must prove beneficial ; and it would have been pardonable for any, even the strongest minds, to follow authorities so imposing. A cause which enlisted the suffrages and eloquent advocacy of Pitt, Fox, Grey, and Canning, amongst Politicians ; Erskine, Romilly, Mackintosh, and Brougham, in the profession of law ; Wilberforce, the prince and leader of a host of independent and Christian philanthropists ; together with Daniel Wilson, Dr. Chalmers, and many others of commanding talents and influence amongst theologians, might well command attention ; and no blame could be attached to those who followed them, although they might commence public life under the influence of opposite opinions.

But that which astounded, and even petrified the nation at the time, and now hangs like the shadow of night on a great and influential party in the State, is, that they passed this Act against their most-cherished principles and convictions. No apology can be offered for this ; no extenuating circumstances can be put in plea ; nothing remains to the warmest friends and admirers of these great men, but mourning over the frailties and weakness of human nature. The danger might be urgent, the pressure great, the case inevitable ; but they ought not to have assisted in consummating an event which they persisted in representing as an evil. If they found it impossible any longer to stem the torrent of Popish power, aided and abetted by its advocates in Parliament, they should have stood out of the way, and left the measure in the hands of its patrons.

It is evident from this that they only considered this question in its political bearings. Had they felt its religious importance ; that the truth of God, the spiritual hopes of the nation, and the state of the souls of men were involved in it, with their views they could not have dared to be accessory to such a measure. But, judging of the measure on merely political maxims, they found it expedient to yield. Had this spirit prevailed at the period of the Reformation, no confiscations of property, no dungeons and imprisonments, no martyrs' heroism, would have arrested the tyranny of Popery, and laid the basis of our religion and freedom. If difficulties, dangers, and even loss of life, could be reasons for yielding to Popery, how much more cogent those reasons must have appeared to the "noble army of martyrs" who won the battle of our freedom by the sacrifice of their lives, than anything which presented itself to intimidate the defenders of our religion and constitution at the period in question. If the essential difference betwixt Popery and Protestantism had been well considered in the spirit of their responsibility to God, by these political champions of our cause, how could they have dared to compromise the one, and give power and influence to the other? It is in vain to affirm, as an apology for them, that these disabilities were either unnecessary or unjust. Adopting the opinions of the Whigs of 1688,—from whom many who bear their name in modern times have completely departed,—they considered these safeguards as essential to the integrity of the Constitution, the purity and stability of the Protestant Church, and also of the freedom of the subject. Then on this showing, as patriots, they ought to have resisted the assaults of the enemy, as long as they had the slightest prospect of success, and only when they had been deserted by the British people, ought they to have surrendered the citadel to the invading foe.

But in this season of trial their political wisdom and courage failed them. The clouds had so thickened around them, as to present a scene of difficulty, impervious to their sagacity; or the fierceness, clangour, and apparent courage, of the onset of agitation, was so furious as to fill them with dismay. In either case the same conclusion must be come to, viz., that on a great religious question, the "wisdom of this world" is perfectly insufficient.

~ No imputation on the principle, honour, or even Christian character of these eminent men, individually, is intended. Their fault, in all probability, was the temptation of their position. The temporal and political view of the subject—hushing the tempest of agitation—overpowered, in their minds, the religious aspects of the case. This is the danger in which all legislative bodies are placed; and indeed it is difficult accurately to define the point where human expediency ought to end, and unbending religious principle begin. One thing, however, is most certain: that all men, and especially public men, ought to act, in religious matters, on the honest convictions of their own minds. Surely christianity is too sacred to be put on and off, or to have its form and fashion changed, as caprice, or even convenience, may dictate. Catholic Emancipation, in its consequences and bearings, was the greatest legislative measure ever passed in the British Parliament, and yet it was carried by those who, at the time, professed their belief that it was an injurious measure; consequently, in their estimate, injurious on the greatest possible scale.

Time, and the subsequent services of these great statesmen, have united to silence all angry emotions; but grief and sorrow still remain. If we found ourselves placed, at this moment, in the position we now hold, by the act of other parties, whilst the professed friends of our cause had retained their political integrity, that, of itself, would have been a mountain of strength. They would have been in a position to defend our Protestant institutions at every point. But, as it is, innumerable evils and dangers are breaking out in every quarter, as the fruit of their own measure, whilst they are obliged to be silent.

By a strange concurrence of circumstances, all the great parties in the Legislature are disarmed of all power to oppose Popery. The liberals have long been the steady advocates of their claims, whilst by conceding and carrying Emancipation, the Conservatives have, in this particular, fraternized with them, and thrown away their shield. In consequence of this, Protestantism is left disarmed, even for defensive warfare in Parliament: for how could men first enfranchise the Church of Rome, and then effectually oppose it? Hence Popery presents itself to view in innumerable aspects of aggression, in which it ought to be made the object of unceasing attack, but the political Protestant phalanx scarcely ever places itself in array against these portentous advances, because shorn of their strength by the previous conduct of its leaders.

But this is not all: the moral feebleness produced by that distressing substitution of expediency for principle, is still felt through the country. The loss of the confidence of so reflective a people as the English, on a great religious question, on the part of their leaders, is not easily recovered. No event in modern times has produced so deep, so thrilling, so paralyzing a shock on the feelings of the nation as this most deplorable betrayal of a cause, which at that time, was as dear to the majority of the people as the warm blood in their veins.

And even now the feelings and sentiments of the Protestant party in this country, are by no means represented in the senate of the nation. Their well-principled attachment to the un mutilated Scriptures; their firm adherence to the peculiar doctrines of the Reformation; their love of religious freedom, and the rights of private judgment; their abhorrence of the claims of his Holiness to universal spiritual dominion; their deep conviction of the abominations of the Roman idolatry, the confessional, indulgences, purgatory, the mass, priestly absolution, together with the enslaving effects of the whole,—are but feebly echoed in the British Parliament. Every thing, then, goes to shew that the Political Protestants, in the great struggle now going on, will need the stimulus and aid of the Church. Expediency is too feeble a power to resist this mighty swell. The infusion of that spirit which breathed in the martyrs must be sought. The clamour, insolence, and dictation of democracy is not desirable, but such a moral feeling and strength ought to be created by religious Protestantism, as shall guide the sentiments and sustain the efforts of our senators. Without this it is utterly in vain to depend upon them to repel the assaults of Popery. The loftiest pedestal is sustained by its basement. The genius and courage of the conqueror of Napoleon, were rendered successful by the skill of his subordinate officers, and the bravery of his soldiers; so in like manner the defence of our Protestantism, in the great arena of Parliament, must be strengthened and upheld by the prayers, devoted zeal, and energetic support of the Christian people of these lands.

The second proof that implicit reliance cannot be placed in worldly politicians, on this question, shall be taken from the circumstances attending the passing of the Irish educational measure. Here we are brought into contact with a new class of statesmen, the old Whig, or Grey school. As this measure was the commencement of those educational movements, which continue, under various guises, to agitate the public mind, it may be proper to examine, with some attention, its leading features.

The progress of Scriptural education was, at the time, of a most encouraging description in Ireland; and the means employed were producing a deep and powerful impression on the Popish Church. Great numbers of children attended the schools of the Kildare-street, Hibernian, Irish Evangelical, and other Societies established for the benevolent and Christian purpose of opening the treasures of eternal truth to these long-neglected, but interesting people. A salutary moral change was taking place; adults as well as children began to appreciate the value of the word of God; anxious enquiries were made on the points of controversy betwixt the Popish and the Protestant Churches; numerous conversions were taking place, and the dawn of a bright day, for Ireland, seemed to appear in the horizon. This state of things produced alarm amongst the Popish Priesthood, and being joined by the liberal party, in both islands, a general burst of furious indignation was poured forth on these peaceful and Christian Societies. The unfairness, sin, and illiberality—an enormity much greater than that of sin—of proselytism, were vehemently decried. Fanaticism, bigotry, uncharitableness, were crimes plentifully attributed to these evangelical labourers; as if it were an evil to convert Roman Catholics to the faith of Protestantism. For what purpose, it may be enquired, was the Protestant Church planted in Ireland at all, but to proselyte the people? If one system of religion is as good and safe as another—which seems to be the opinion of great numbers,—then the outcry against any attempt at converting the people of Ireland is well founded. But this was not the sentiment entertained by the Reformers, and it cannot now be the feeling of any one pretending to any other kind of religion than that which blends all clashing and opposing elements in one mighty confusion, by putting “light for darkness, and darkness for light.”

The then new ministry of the day heard this yell of Popery against the educational exertions of the Protestants; and either from sympathy or fear, adopted it as their own. The grant of money, which had long been annually made to the Kildare-street Society, was withheld, and a new scheme devised, on the model of Popish principle and opinion. This was avowed. The argument for the measure was—that as the Kildare-street Society made the Bible, without note, comment, or catechism, the basis of its system, and the Roman Catholics could not send their children where the Bible was read, it was necessary to get rid of the obnoxious book, and adopt a system in which they could concur. Here then, it is seen that Protestantism is made to succumb to Popery, by persons professing to hold the faith of the Established Church; and at a period, and under circumstances, in which it would be imagined, they would have taken just a contrary course, and fed, encouraged, and strengthened the Protestant flame then beginning to burst forth.

We have attributed this encouragement given to the Popish movement, on the part of the government, either to sympathy or fear. It must be the one or the other; and whichever it might be, the same conclusion must be come to; viz., that they sacrificed the interests of Protestantism by adopting, as the leading feature of their measure, one of the most pernicious dogmas of Rome,—that the Bible cannot be safely put into the hands of the people. So far as this point goes, the act is a legislative sanction of this most unjust, tyrannic, and unchristian usurpation of the “Man of sin.” The British Parliament, under the guidance of Earl Grey’s ministry, has virtually established by law, for the government of its own national schools in Ireland, one of the leading tenets of the Church of Rome. The national system in Ireland rests on an act of the Imperial Parliament as its basis, and is supported by the public money. The leading principle of these institutions is, that the Bible shall not be taught, and has been adopted as a concession to the Church of Rome. The inference is inevitable, viz., that this infamous dogma is the law of the land. Popery then, in one of its most odious doctrines, is established—it is the infantine religion of the State. In this insidious way, in all human probability, the Papacy will recover its power through the empire. It is not likely that any attempt will be made to fasten the anti-christian hierarchy on the shoulders of the nation at once; but, as in this case, one point will be sought after another till the whole will be gradually attained. In Ireland we are greeted with the spectacle of two Establishments, equally attached to the state; a Protestant Church, to teach the adults within her own pale; and then a great and universal school apparatus, to teach Popery. Which of the two rival government institutions will gain the ascendant, it is not difficult to divine. A system which embraces, teaches, and directs the young mind of a nation, must infallibly possess the fealty of that nation. The youth of Ireland have been given by act of Parliament to the Popish Church; and as to the old, feeble, and tottering Establishment, set up by the doting Reformers, she is left to die a natural death, amid the joyous shouts of the rising progeny of the subjects of Rome.

This legislation on the Bible is a bold and daring assumption of unauthorized power. On the ground of their divinity, the sacred writings are above all human authority. They are the free gift of God to all mankind; the charter of our privileges, and the covenant of our salvation. To determine by act of Parliament that they shall be read or not read, mutilated or unmutilated by the community, is to subject them to the condition of a code amenable to human authority, which is of itself an invasion of the prerogatives of the Supreme Divinity. Christianity is antecedent to, and above all earthly power or law. It stands on a level with the natural, or rather the divine rights of the human race. The right to life, or freedom, in case neither is forfeited by crime, is not more perfect and indefeasible than the right to the Bible. The reason is obvious: The exigencies of our salvation cannot be provided for by human legislation; must rest with the Deity; are necessarily limited to his grace and love; and consequently, if He chuses to make known the mode by his truth, and offer the privileges in his covenant of grace, this must infinitely transcend the authority of man. A law which interdicts the means by which the divine grace and mercy are made known, equally interdicts the blessings in question. An arrangement which prevents a community from coming to a knowledge of the faith of Christ, will, in its results, prevent the blessings of that faith being enjoyed. What earthly power then, it may be asked, can have the prerogative to place itself betwixt the Redeemer of man and the purposes of his mercy and grace? How can the right to possess the Gospel, written and unmutilated, be refused to the meanest child under heaven without violating his dearest interests,—his highest privileges? In prohibiting the free and unfettered use of the Scriptures, the Church of Rome has been guilty of haughty injustice and tyranny, as well as directly invaded the prerogatives of God. When the British Parliament seconded her in this abomination, adopted this dogma as its own, and made it, if not directly, yet virtually, the law of the land, did not the nation become her partner in guilt?

What then, it is triumphantly asked, must be done? Are the people to be left without instruction, if they choose to repudiate the bible? The answer to this is short and plain: let what may arise, we have no right to be accessary to evil. No conceivable case can equal, in its magnitude of mischief, the adoption of this fatal measure. Like many other enormities, the tyranny of Popery, at least in this form, was wearing itself out. The people were restless for the word of God, and began to free themselves from the oppression. But just at this moment, when the priesthood of Rome felt its feebleness : and its grasp on the people was beginning to give way, the State stepped in to its rescue, and gave the Irish nation back again as its prey.

All this as been conceded by a party in the State, calling themselves Protestants ; and indeed priding themselves, not merely on the soundness, but also on the fervour of their devotedness to the principles they hold. Good intentions may be accorded them, but it is a most singular coincidence of facts, that every movement made by these devoted Protestants, turns out in the issue to be the furtherance of Popery. Surely it might have satisfied the most fastidious and sensitive liberality to allow the Romish Church, by its own ecclesiastical system, to banish the bible from its people, without adopting the iniquitous principle as a national act. To tolerate the Popish priesthood in driving the children of English subjects from Scriptural schools, to which they were sent by their parents, and to compel them to receive the dogmas of Popery in the place of the truths of Christianity, it might be imagined, would have been a sufficient amount of freedom, without making the British people partners in the crime, by furnishing the funds, supplying the machinery, and adopting the coercive scheme as the law of the land.

When will the country awake to the degradation of her position ? This one enactment has made her the humble handmaid of Papal Rome again. Away with the cant respecting extracts, new translations, impartial commissioners !—The wily priest has caught the confiding politician, and made him his humble tool in affirming one of the most pernicious dogmas of his Church, as well as in carrying into effect the most cruel and oppressive of his exactions. The bible is withheld from the children of a whole people by Act of Parliament. The British nation are parties with the Pope of Rome, in depriving these people of a right and privilege which belongs to them on an immutable, because a divine tenure. They have as perfect a right to the Scriptures, and with them to the blessings of Christianity, as they have of life itself, and a state would be no more sinning in principle against the rights of mankind in passing an Act of Parliament to take away life, than in taking away the bible. Neither are in the keeping of human legislation. The one is the gift of God as the CREATOR ; the other is the gift of God as the REDEEMER. Life and religion stand on an equal footing, because they are equally divine.

Were it not for the mischief involved, it would be most amusing—if the observer could free himself from the feeling of disgust—to behold every political theorist, every pseudo-philosopher, every school agitator, propounding to us their sapient nonsense on the inexpediency and the danger of employing the Bible in the instruction of youth. Thus a principle which was generated in the darkest days of Popery to prop up its despotism, by blinding the eyes of the people, in withholding the Scriptures from them, is now registered on the statute book of England, is applauded by the orators of the day as the quintessence of philosophical wisdom, brought up as by magic, or the diving bell, from the depths of modern discovery. And is it possible that such deception can exist ! That men can be working into the public mind of this country one of the most pernicious doctrines of Rome, and attempt to make it, under various pretensions, the basis of a national system of education, and yet the parties imagine at the same time that they are doing some wonderfully liberal thing, and advancing the cause of universal freedom ! Such are the follies we behold, and such the professions under which they are performed. Under the mask of religious freedom, such principles are gaining ground amongst us, as must inevitably, if not arrested—and probably before we are aware—lead to a state of Popish and universal despotism. Talk of the progress of liberty ! Protect the poor and oppressed Roman Catholics from the cruel tyranny of the priests ; secure to them the rights of conscience and private judgement ; throw around their poor and terribly doomed offspring, the free and unmolested privilege of attending Scriptural schools ; gain for the whole people freedom of worship, and make the whole secure by enactments of law, with a watchful and impartial magistracy, and then something will be done for freedom. Can anything be a greater burlesque on common sense, than to pass an Act of Parliament, and take other measures, to consign over, with increased means of keeping them in thralldom, the whole Popish population to their priestly task-masters, and then call this liberty ?

Here then again is the betrayal of our cause. The gentlemen who promoted this measure, are professed Protestants. But it is most evident that they either misunderstood the nature of their own measure, or otherwise, intentionally played into the hands of Popery. In either case the same conclusion must be come to, viz., that they cannot be safely trusted with the religious destinies of this great empire. Lost in the turmoil of party politics ; eager for popularity ; deluded by the phantom of liberality ; anxious to conciliate the favour, and gain the support, of a party able to render them some service by their votes ; or, otherwise, prevented from perceiving the points of difference between human expediency and the immutable claims of religious principle, by their habits of reflection on questions of civil and temporal legislation, they seem not, in general, to possess the caution, gravity, and inflexible fealty to religion, which her divinity and sacredness demand. The hand of Uz-ziah withered when he profanely put it out to touch the ark of God ; it is well for the politicians of the day that they live under a milder dispensation, or a similar calamity might befall many.

LETTER III.

The course of our remarks on the vacillating tactics of mere worldly politicians, in regard to Popery, and the insecurity of our Protestant institutions in their hands, brings us now to consider the spirit and policy of the present Government. The progress of legislation in favour of this dangerous Church, and the consequent power they have attained, is steady, but rapid and alarming.

1. The Conservative party, we have seen, conceded Emancipation against their principles and judgment. This first measure was simply the removal of their civil disabilities.

2. The Grey Ministry went further, and, adopting a leading Popish sentiment, established a national system of education, on the principle of excluding the Holy Scriptures. This measure, by Act of Parliament, consigned the children of the Irish nation into the hands of the Popish priesthood, instead of leaving them to be instructed by voluntary societies in Scriptural schools, or encouraging and strengthening the national Church, to perform this educational duty, as well as to seek to recover the whole population from the dark and dismal superstition in which they are involved.

3. The next step in the descending scale, brings us to a still more fearful point, viz., the direct countenance, support, patronage, and endowment of the Church of Rome by the present Government.

4. By way of anticipation, it is not unreasonable to look for a fourth and more alarming demonstration by another party, still more in favour of Popery. The Marquis of Normanby is understood to be aspiring to the Premiership, and to be actually on the threshold of that high office. Taking the government of that nobleman, in Ireland, as the index of his future policy, it is hazardous little to believe that he will set himself strenuously to advance the claims of the Roman hierarchy. Neither profound knowledge, want of confidence, scrupulous delicacy in the employment of means, over-attachment to any form of religion, anxiety to live in grave and holy retirement, objection to the turmoils of office and the shouts of popularity, or even desire to return again to the avocation of writing novels to relieve the tedium of life, or swell the tide of his fame; not one, or all these things united, are at all likely to stand in the way of that high genius to attempt to do something to distinguish himself for the glory of Popery, far beyond that of any of his predecessors. He certainly will scorn to tread in the cautious footsteps of those who have only been "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for the temple of idolatry. The next step will, in all probability, be an attempt to establish Popery in Ireland; the measure which Lord Howick announced as the true question for consideration, but kept in abeyance for the present by his more conscientious or timid colleagues. When the Marquis of Normanby assumes the reins of Government, nothing less than this will be the point at which he will aim. We shall see!!!

At present, however, it is necessary to trace the conduct of the party now in power, in relation to what has been done already. Many things must be put out of our consideration, as too extraneous or too political, though they bear most unequivocally on the subject. But our business being chiefly with the Church, such affairs as the Lichfield House compact; the direct leaning of a Protestant Government on the Popish members for its very existence; the valuable consideration in patronage and power given in return; the promotion of Popish gentlemen to all sorts of offices, to the exclusion of nearly all the Protestants, except occasionally a Liberal, to keep the party quiet: the graceful spectacle of a nobleman giving his courtly services in the palace of the Queen, and then heading an Irish agitation against a measure on the subject of tithes, introduced into and carried through Parliament by her own Ministry; these, and a thousand other matters of a similar description must be omitted. Yet no one can deny that they all have a most intimate connexion with the elevation of the Popish hierarchy.

It is, then, an undeniable fact, that the Irish Popish Church has been so encouraged, supported, and patronized, by the present Government as to be placed, not only in a new and more advanced position, but also in a state of moral dominance in that country. The policy seems to be, so to elevate, strengthen, and inflate this Church as to make its establishment irresistibly necessary. This, of course, could not be accomplished at once. A course of preparation, of a longer or shorter duration, must be essential. Hence, dignity and influence are given to her priesthood; office and power to her laity; facilities and means afforded for the erection of new and imposing places of worship; as well as impunity, and, indeed, stimulus, to her to assume and enlarge her old ecclesiastical platform. All this has been sedulously going on for some years. A mere stranger, passing through the country, is instantly apprized of the fact, that Popery is the dominant, the favoured, and the triumphant religion of the land.

This moral energy accorded to the system is of much greater service than assistance in any other form. It inspires new life; animates to vigorous exertion and enterprise; gives boldness and assurance; produces united, increased, and zealous habits of devotion to the cause; encourages the assumption, vindication, and enforcement of their haughty and injurious claims; and puts them into an attitude of aggression, such as they have not dared to assume for many ages. This is quite natural. Bodies of men, whether united for civil or religious purposes, must move towards their object with slow and cautious, or bold and undaunted steps, just as they are encouraged by an adequate or an insufficient hope of success; and this again, must be influenced by the means at their command.

Popery possesses no religious power, properly considered. Hers is the power of superstition and error, or that of a jesuitical employment of political means. The bible, which she banishes; the evangelical doctrines of Christianity, which she so miserably corrupts; the simple and holy ordinances of religion, which she secularizes by her forms; the pure and elevated morality of the Gospel, which she neutralizes by her casuistry and human distinctions; and the presence of God, promised in the service of the Church, whom she excludes by placing the Virgin and the saints as co-partners of His throne; none of these great principles and verities of religion can be any strength or power to her. The influence she possesses, and the dominion she exercises, is borrowed. Her conquests have been, indeed, numerous, and her authority great, but they have ever been the conquests of "carnal weapons" under the garb of religion. The agency of the kings of the earth, the dungeons and murders of the Inquisition, and the insidious employment of the secular arm, have always been the ministers of her usurped and tyrannic dominion.

Hence the support of the secular power of this country now afforded to this corrupt Church, has already produced a perfect change in her spirit and demands. It has drawn her from obscurity, and emboldened her to stand forth in all the effrontery of her proud and boastful superiority. By these means a co-partnership is established. We behold the hateful spectacle of the state playing into the hands of Popery, and she, on her part, yielding her deleterious support, or rather increasing her domination over the state. The Protestant Church is no longer the moral instrument employed by the state to teach religion, to soften the asperities of the people, to unite them to the throne and the empire; this office is now ominously assigned to the Church of Rome. Nothing is expected, sought, or desired from the former, but the mere occupancy of her churches, her tithes, and the naked dignity of her titles; for a season. She is treated as a sinecure occupant of old, useless, and falling possessions; something like the chiefs of coast, or feudal castles, no longer useful for the defence of the nation, but retained to afford an asylum and living to veterans who have lost their limbs in the active service of the country. How long a Church, which is treated as a sinecure, no longer necessary to the good of the nation, and unessential as the instructress of the people and support of the public faith, will be permitted to exist in these times of utility and reform, it is not difficult to divine.

In the mean time, the reasons given for deserting the Protestant Church and transferring the favour of the state to her rival, are most curious. These reasons all merge in one, viz., that she has failed in converting the Papists into Protestants. It is considered an evil in her not to have accomplished this object of her mission. By implication it follows that it is most desirable that this should be accomplished. Now the common sense conclusion would have been, that the causes of failure should be sought out and remedies applied. But no, instead of this being the case, she is set aside as useless, and the very superstition, idolatry, tyranny, and national plague, which she failed to remove, is taken into the favour of the state. And what do our politico-ecclesiastics intend to do with their bargain? Will they convert them into sound, loyal, and holy Protestants? If it were desirable for the national well-being that the Protestant Church should do this, it must be equally so that the new moral agency, brought into con-fraternity with Popery, should do it. And moreover, if it were a sin that the Church did not make the Irish people a peaceful community of loyal Christians, it must be a sin for our political philosophers not to accomplish so desirable an object.

But no, this is not the purpose. So long as the Papists were destitute of secular weight and importance, all parties of statesmen deplored the terrible evils of Popery, and felt the necessity of their conversion to the Protestant faith. But now the case is altered. They can bring their millions into the political scale; furnish their quota of votes in Parliament; turn the balance betwixt contending parties; and keep in or put out the present, and, for anything which appears, succeeding Ministers. This makes all the difference. We now hear no more, except from dull or enthusiastic theologians, respecting the dangers of Popery. The temptation to the present amalgamation of our Protestant Government with the Popish power, was great; indeed, pressing beyond all precedent. Liberal principles were in danger, and Popery has become liberal! The best test of her liberality, however, is to be sought, not in her bland and enthusiastic professions, but within her own precincts. She has the power—for amongst her own people she is omnipotent—to exercise a lenient, gentle, and liberal sway. What kind of sceptre does she wield? The answer to this enquiry cannot be given. Human language cannot depict the horrors of her rule. Does she allow her disciples to read God's holy book? No. Does she permit them to exercise their own free and unbiassed judgements and consciences in matters of faith, the most important which can engage the thought of man? No. Does she suffer them to enquire into the differences betwixt their own and the Protestant Church, by reading, hearing the Gospel preached, or otherwise? No. Does she tolerate them in the education of their children in the way their parents often most approve? No. Nay, more than this; are they not often threatened, denounced, and visited with various penances, if they dare to have any temporal dealings with heretics, employ their franchise otherwise than as their priests direct, or in any way step beyond the line of their own dark despotism in search of one ray of the light of truth? Liberal principles! These despots come to teach and aid us in carrying out liberal principles! Truth is one—liberty is one. Let them set themselves free, and then, it will be within the limits of possibility that they may aid the British nation in securing and enlarging their freedom; or at least, they will be in a state to mingle with them in its enjoyments, but not till then.

The fond aim of these parties is to make us all brother Papists with themselves. They do not bring their forces to support the party in power that the nation may calmly and peacefully repose under her free and Protestant constitution, but to aid in unloosing the foundation of all things, so that, under the guise of liberty, they may prepare the way for the introduction of their own despotic sway. Would this advance our freedom? Let the present enslaved, ignorant, barbarous, and wretched state of the Irish peasantry answer this question.

It may be readily admitted that the strength of the nation consists in the unity of its people, and the security of its freedom in the fealty of all parties to its institutions. The hope that this might be effected, no doubt, induced many, whose Protestant feeling and attachment to the British constitution cannot for a moment be doubted, to support the removal of the penal statutes and civil disabilities, under which the Roman Catholic population lay. The experiment has been tried without success. Instead of being less attached to the throne and system of Rome, in consequence of their nearer connexion with that of England, and her unrivalled constitution, they are, if possible, more loyal to the one, and less so to the other. Instead of this kingdom within a kingdom, created by the organization of her hierarchy and the dominion of her priesthood being broken up, Popery is more compact, united, isolated, and anti-national than ever. She moves altogether in a circle of her own. The interest of her Church is the basis of all her operations. The objects pursued by the nation, and those sought by this alien power, are perfectly dissimilar. The one is struggling to maintain her independence, her integrity, her religion, her freedom; the other is employing her utmost skill and power to link the destinies of the country to a foreign despotism.

For ages the empire, reposing under the peaceful influence of Protestant instructions, appeared like the blue ocean beneath the bright sunshine of heaven, whilst the setting in of Popery, has been like a mountain deluge, rendering muddy and turbid the pure and tranquil waters. Every thing English is now sought to be poisoned by the malaria of the Pontine marshes of Italy. To talk of the struggle of principle now going on as that of Toryism and Whiggery, is a perfect delusion. This was the case in ages gone by, but a third party has entered the field, and completely turned the tide of battle. The antagonist forces in the presence of each other are Protestantism on the one side, and Popery on the other. In this as in other things England has been assimilated to Ireland. No one ever hears the party names employed in this country in the neighbouring island. The Protestants and the Roman Catholics are the terms employed to designate the party divisions existing in that country. Those two mighty interests absorb every thing else. So it must be in this country ere long. To this point we are rapidly verging. Under the new cognomen and array of Conservatism, or some other to be selected for the purpose, Protestantism will collect her mighty energies, whilst Popery, either in her own unveiled character, or some one assumed for the purpose, will marshal her opposing hosts. Indeed we have nearly arrived at this already. There may be some loose and light enthusiasts who are dreaming of Utopian schemes of republican freedom; but it must be evident to every body but themselves, that the millions of Papists on the one hand, headed by their priesthood; and the millions of Protestants on the other, led on by their chiefs, must decide the momentous contest. The few persons amongst us of no creed, no principles, no fixed opinions—unless attachment to their own crude negations can be so considered, will be crushed, or driven before these two mighty forces as the air-bubbles of a lake before the confluence of two mighty rivers, struggling on its bosom for the mastery of the channel.

The ground of complaint is, that the present party in power has given its moral weight in favour of Popery. It is made a mark of identity with the ten kingdoms into which the Roman Pagan Empire was divided, that they "gave their power to the Beast." Many commentators have attempted to show that England was not one of these kingdoms. The doubt, however, seems now likely to be cleared up. If in ages past our ancestors rendered a reluctant and imperfect homage to this ominous power, the defect seems now likely to be amply supplied. And where is the difference in principle between "the kings of the earth giving their power to the Beast," and the dominant party in this limited monarchy doing the same? Such is the structure of Popery, that she can receive homage in every form, and from all parties. In the new arrangement of things in this country, the popular branch of the three estates is the governing power, and, strange to say, the democratic portion of our divided constitution has, again and again, presented the sweet incense of its favour and patronage to Popery.

Lest all which has been said respecting the moral influence of the present party in power being given to the Church of Rome, should be mistaken for declamation, it may be proper to refresh the memory of the reader by the mention of a few facts.

1. Then what was meant by the celebrated appropriation clause, but injury to the Protestant Church, and favour to the Popish? If, as the Prime Minister stated, this measure was calculated to "deal a heavy blow and great discouragement to the Protestant Church"; the converse of this must be true, viz., that it was calculated to deal a heavy blow and great encouragement in favour of the Church of Rome. When it was proposed to confiscate the property of the Church, secular education, indeed, was the object to which it was proposed to appropriate the funds. All this did very well as the excuse for an argument; but there did not exist a man in England, or in the civilized world, who took an interest in the measures of our legislature, whether Tory, Whig, Radical, Papist, or Protestant, who did not believe, and know, that the measure was intended to weaken the power of the Protestant, and increase that of the Popish Church.

2. The permitted resumption of the ecclesiastical titles of the Irish Church by the Popish priests, is another illustration of the bias and policy of the party now in power. The Relief Bill prohibited the assumption of these titles on the part of the Popish priests, and guarded the enactment by the sanction of severe penalties. The reader must recollect the true nature of this measure. It is not that these parties shall not adopt the titles and perform the functions of vicars-apostolic, bishops, and archbishops, if they choose to do so. They are at perfect liberty to do this; but the object was to prevent them assuming the titles of the Anglican prelates, and that for a most obvious reason. No question can be entertained, but the priesthood of the Church of Rome cherish the notion of occupying the dioceses of the Establishment, and that provision of the Relief Bill was intended to prevent this catastrophe. The importance of the clause, in the estimation of the authors of the measure, may be imagined by the amount of penalty annexed. The Archiepiscopal office of Tuam has been abolished; but long before this took place, by the demise of the late prelate, Dr. M'Hale assumed the title, and in all his clerical documents invariably signed himself "JOHN TUAM." By the strenuous exertions of the Protestant party in the Commons, indeed, a petition presented as the humble request of this Archbishop of Tuam, has been rejected on account of its glaring violation of an existing Act of Parliament, but with indecent reluctance; and many stammering apologies on the part of the Noble Lord at the head of the Government in this House. In the mean time the law is suffered to slumber in the statute book, and this Popish Archbishop is left in undisturbed possession of his illegally assumed dignity.

The spirit in which these usurpations are viewed by those in power may easily be perceived from another transaction in connexion with "JOHN TUAM." On a requisition being presented to the Lord-lieutenant of a county to convene a public meeting, this ecclesiastic claimed, and exercised, the right of precedence over the new Bishop of the Church, who may be fairly considered as the representative of the opinions and feelings of the government of which his father is a member. We see, first in order, the name of John Archbishop of Tuam in this document, and then, humbly follows the signature of "THOMAS TUAM," the bishop of the Established Church. Had Thomas Tuam been acting in his private capacity, and been called upon to give his own name (Plunkett) instead of that of his country's Church, the position in which he placed it would be sufficiently elevated. But when the question of precedence lies betwixt England and Rome, it assumes a very different aspect, and nothing short of the most reptile meanness, anti-national sentiments, or religious poltroonism could lead to so base a compromise. Here we are cheered with the spectacle of a dignitary of the English Church, trained in the new school of Christian politics, publicly acknowledging the superiority of Rome over England,—Popery over Protestantism. What should prevent this gentleman becoming a subject of the Holy See, but the emoluments of office? In open profession he acknowledges, by his act, the superiority of the Papal hierarchy over his own:—it is first in his notions of ecclesiastical supremacy; he must consequently, as regards Church order, be a true son of Rome, and Protestantism would be much safer without such shepherds of her flocks—such guardians of her folds. This case, indeed, would be of trivial consequence considered in itself. But as the index of a class of sentiments, which there is good reason to believe, extensively exist in the school of which this young bishop is a disciple, it is of great value and consequence. By these concessions, compromises, and gradual surrender of first one and then another great principle to Popery, she will soon occupy the position she seeks. By the national school act she obtained the recognition of her dangerous dogma, which excludes the Scriptures from the people: and now, by this compromise, she has wheedled, or bullied, one of the bishops of the Established Church, who probably speaks and acts for his party—into an acknowledgment of her SUPREMACY.

3. Many of the colonies presenting, like the American wilderness, an open field for religious cultivation, it follows that free scope is afforded for the development of the plans of any party happening to be in power. Of course the whole, or nearly the whole country, being unoccupied, a fair opportunity is afforded for the display of either Protestant or Popish zeal. Alas! we have no record of any remarkable countenance and support given to the one system, but we have abundance of proof of attachment to the other. The parties themselves may, we presume, be believed on this subject. The Catholic Directory for 1839, either in gratitude or in exultation, states:—

"Under the protection of her Majesty's Government, the British Colonies, East, West, and North, have received New Bishops and Vicars-General: Bishop Clancy, for British Guiana; Bishop Smith, as coadjutor to the Bishop of Trinidad: Bishop Carew, as coadjutor to the Bishop of Calcutta: Bishop Griffiths, at the Cape of Good Hope: and Bishop Hynes, as coadjutor to the Ionian Isles,—all of whom, as well as in Australia, are supplied with a well-selected accession of assistant Missionaries."

The "protection of her Majesty's Government" is no barren and useless friendship, as may be seen by the following extract from a most valuable paper on the "Statistics of Popery in Great Britain and the Colonies," in Frazer's Magazine for April, 1839:—

"In Upper Canada there are, as declared in the Parliamentary papers of 1836, which are our authorities in the following statements on the Colonies, thirty Roman Catholic priests receiving from Government £50 each, and one Bishop receiving £100.

"In Lower Canada, according to the same documents, the Roman Catholic Church has all their tithe, liable only to a few exceptions in favour of Protestants. A numerous priesthood produces a colonial epitome of Ireland. The Popish Bishop receives from our Government £1000 per annum.

"In Newfoundland, the Romish Bishop has £75 per annum, by parliamentary grant.

"A grant of eight acres of land," says Mr. Gladstone, in his work on Church and State, "has lately been made for the erection of a Roman Catholic Cathedral. It is stated by parties connected with the Colonies, that the contributions of the Roman Catholics of Newfoundland, to the support of their Bishop and Clergy, amount in value to not less than £6000 or £7000 annually.

"In Jamaica, one Romish Bishop, and two Priests. It seems that the Jamaica House of Assembly affords no assistance to Popery. Query—is this the reason for its proposed annihilation by the Queen's ministers?

"Trinidad—Two Romish Bishops, Drs. M'Donnell and Smith, and twenty-two Priests; to whom, it appears, by the parliamentary papers referred to, £2487 was granted by Government in 1835, whereas £860 only was given to the Clergy of the Protestant Church. This reminds one of the Irishman's idea of reciprocity, which was all on one side.

" Granada—Six Priests, to whom are given certain lands as their support.

" St. Vincent—Two Priests.

" St. Lucia—Six Priests, to whom are granted 11,000 francs per annum. The Catholic Directory for 1839, adds, 'Permanent salaries have been granted by the Colonial Government to these four, and a similar provision made for an additional one.'

" Dr. Smith, the coadjutor Bishop, is now in England, begging from West India merchants, under the plea that the Priests alone are able to quiet the emancipated negroes. Better that the children of Africa had remained in such slavery as they were born in, than come under the iron crosier and foul despotism of Rome.

" Dominica—Five Priests, paid by the Colonial Government.

" Mountserrat and Barbadoes—Two Priests, do.

" Gibraltar—Church of Rome receives from Government £196 per annum, of which the vicar-apostolic takes £100.

" Malta—A Romish Chaplain is supported by our Government, and military salutes paid to Popish festivals.

" Ionian Islands—Thirteen Popish Chapels, with salaries amounting to £1010 per annum.

" Australia—One Romish Bishop, and twenty-two Priests; and these are endowed by our Government on the same terms as the Clergy of the English and Scottish Churches. To the deep disgrace of the Presbytery of New South Wales, a unanimous vote was passed approving of these 'judicious and impartial regulations;' and Dr. Laing has lauded this sacrifice of principle in no measured terms. Dr. Polding, the Popish Bishop, was sent out by our Government. On the 27th of August, 1838, the following estimates were moved by the Secretary, and agreed to by the Legislative Council:—

ROMAN CATHOLIC CLERGY.

The Right Rev. the Roman Catholic Bishop	£500	0	0
The Vicar-General	200	0	0
Fourteen Roman Catholic Chaplains at £150 each, per annum	2100	0	0
To provide salaries for six additional Chaplains, expected to arrive in the year 1839.	900	0	0
	<hr/>
	£3800	0	0

PROSPECTIVE ENCOURAGEMENT.

Allowance to Chaplains for travelling expences	£200	0	0
Towards erecting Chapels, and dwellings for Chaplains, ON	1600	0	0
CONDITION OF AN EQUAL SUM BEING RAISED BY PRI-VATE CONTRIBUTION
	<hr/>
	£1800	0	0

ROMAN CATHOLIC SCHOOLS.

Towards the support of Roman Catholic Schools at present established in the Colony	£800	0	0
In aid of additional Schools, on condition of sums to an equal amount being raised by private subscription.....	300	0	0
Towards the support of destitute Roman Catholic children.....	1000	0	0
	£2100	0	0

“ Madras Mission for India—Two Bishops and ten Priests ; to whom are given, by the State, 16,697 sicca rupees, or £1669 14s.

“ If to these endowments of the Romish Church be added the annual grant to Maynooth, it will be found that our Government—Tory or Whig, for both are equally guilty—grants, for the dishonour of God, the ruin of souls, and the extinction of truth, not less than £30,000 per annum. If, to all these, the grants to the National Schools of Ireland be added, the countenance shown to the Papal Church, by our country, is most painful. Disastrous policy ! Surely individual Protestants will neutralize this pernicious conduct, by doing much more than they have done; for the downfall of Babylon.”

A friend, who is well acquainted with the West Indies has sent me a copy of the Barbadoes New Times, containing the following “ Government Notice.”

GOVERNMENT NOTICE.

THE RIGHT REVEREND THE LORD BISHOP OF OLYMPUS, having been pleased to appoint the Reverend WILLIAM RODGERS as Minister of the Roman Catholic Church in Barbados, the same is hereby Published for general information.

By His Excellency's Command,
JOSEPH GARRAWAY,
Acting Private Secretary.

Government-House, Barbados, }
2nd March, 1839.

This document clearly identifies the government of Barbadoes with the operations of the Church of Rome. Would the governor employ the Royal Arms, the government press, the authority and influence of his own name and office, together with the signature of his secretary, to proclaim the auspicious event of the approach of a Popish priest, had he not received some instructions from home to do so ? Would the LORD BISHOP OF OLYMPUS have his TITLES proclaimed in this “ Government Notice,” had not the government in this country determined to sanction the claims of the Papacy!

One instance more of favour shown to the Roman Catholic Church may be added: the large allotments of land called "Clergy Reserves," in Canada, set apart originally for the support of the Protestant religion, it is now proposed to divide, on the plan of giving equal parts to the Church of England, the Church of Rome, and the Church of Scotland, and by way of keeping all other parties quiet, to confer one share amongst them.

4. The last display of Popish feeling on the part of the present party in power, which may be noticed, is, to foist Popery into the new scheme of national education. As this is so fully before the public, it need not be dwelt upon further than to notice that, up to the present moment, the vigilance, zeal, and fixed determination of the party to serve the cause they have espoused, have evidently suffered no abatement. The first plan of the Committee of Privy Council, to allow the Popish Bible, with its iniquitous notes, to be used in the Normal School, in which it was proposed to train hundreds of youths for the service of the country, at a time when they might all have the favour of receiving the necessary virus, is sufficiently evident in its meaning. But being defeated in this, a grand change in the plan is proposed, to the effect, that, these Lords of the Council shall be at liberty to accomplish privately, and by their own irresponsible power, if they think proper, what the country has determined they shall not be allowed to do publicly. Truly these persons must entertain a curious opinion of the temper and spirit of the English people. They claim the innocent and unsuspecting trust and confidence of the public with all the boldness of conscious integrity and innocence. After the ample opportunities afforded, will the nation allow this new power to be assumed and exercised in favour of Popery? Why do not the promoters of this scheme proceed to accomplish their purpose in the old English, and constitutional method, by Bill? Just because it would give the other House the opportunity of expressing an opinion, and thwarting the measure. It may be fairly questioned—indeed, confidently alleged, that the means adopted to carry this measure are in perfect harmony with the jesuitry of the scheme itself.

Then from all these facts and circumstances it may be asked, is it safe, is it rational, is it English, is it Christian, to confide the religious destinies of the country to such hands as these?

It is quite time for other parties to appear on the stage. Too long have the ministers of religion stood aloof. Their meek and quiet demeanour, in the midst of the perils of our Protestant Christianity, is surely sufficient to screen them from the imputation of political meddlers. But if other parties turn aside from the path of secular legislation to corrupt and endanger our pure Christianity, for the purpose of making it the instrument of their power, then for the ministers of religion to remain neutral, is to betray their sacred trust. This time is now fully come. To doubt respecting the course of the current, is folly; to be indifferent as to the result, is cowardice or treachery. The voice of our Christianity must now be heard in high places. The result cannot be doubtful. A light is going forth, which will either flash conviction or confusion on the enemies of our Protestantism; and by the blessing of Almighty God, the Church will gather strength in the storm, and stand forth in greater majesty to rebuke her enemies, as well as in greater purity and charity to bless the world.

LETTER IV.

IF the present collision betwixt the Popish and Protestant parties in the State is, as we have shewn a pre-eminently religious question, then this will not only justify the appearance of religious men on the field of contest, but make it absolutely their duty to take their place and support their principles. The remark of Bishop Burnet (Life and Times) in reference to the divisions and coldness of Protestants of his day is equally applicable to the present time:—"The whole body of Protestants, if united, might be an equal match to the Church of Rome. It is much superior to them in wealth and in force, if it were animated with the zeal which the monastic orders, but chiefly the Jesuits, spread through their whole communion: whereas the Reformed are cold and unconcerned, as well as disjointed, in matters that relate to religion." In removing this reproach, and bringing about a better state of things, great difficulties lie in the way, and especially in regard to unity. Such is the rancour and animosity of many Protestant sects towards each other, that they would evidently rather witness the ascendancy of Popery than unite with their rival in repelling the danger. However, there is, no doubt, among all parties of true Protestants, large numbers who might be brought to rally—not on neutral ground, for there can be none in this contest—but on the well-understood principles of our general Protestantism.

1. THE PRESERVATION OF THE CONSTITUTION AND THE MONARCHY IS A POINT ON WHICH ALL REAL PROTESTANTS MAY WELL AGREE. The advancement of Popery is opposed to the spirit and genius of the Constitution, the integrity and independence of the nation, the security of the monarchy, and the freedom of the subject. Let us try these questions by an induction of particulars. One of the leading doctrines of Popery is the supremacy of his Holiness the Pope. What is meant by this dogma? The plausible Jesuit, and the blind democrat his dupe, will unite to affirm that this claim is limited simply to spiritual things; relates to abstract questions of theology; has nothing to do with any thing but men's consciences; and is only a ghostly influence exercised by an old venerable saint at Rome over his disciples and admirers in distant nations;—that this claim can injure no worldly and civil interests, endanger no rights of princes or of nations, and in no way interfere with the freedom of men. This is only said when a deception has to be played off on the gullibility and simplicity of parties, to be "taken captive" by this enemy "at his will." How is the matter of this supremacy put by their own highest authorities? The angelic doctor, Thomas Aquinas, says, that, "in the Pope is the top of both powers (temporal and spiritual) and that when any one is denounced excommunicate for apostacy, his subjects are immediately freed from his dominion and their oath of allegiance." Baronius holds, "that there can be no doubt of it, but that the civil principality is subject to the sacerdotal; and that God hath made the political government subject to the dominion of the spiritual Church." Bellarmine delivers it as the common opinion of Catholics, "that by reason of the spiritual power, the Pope, at least indirectly, hath a supreme power even in temporal matters." The Bull of Pope Sixtus V. against the two sons of Henry, King of Navarre, and Prince of Conde, begins thus—"The authority given to St. Peter and his successors, by the immense power of the eternal King, excels all the power of earthly Kings and Princes. It passes uncontrollable sentence upon them all; and if they find any of them resisting God's ordinance, it takes more severe vengeance of them, casting them down from their thrones, though never so powerful, and tumbling them down to the lowest parts of the earth, as the ministers of aspiring Lucifer;" and then, in the exercise of this authority, "We deprive them and their posterity for ever, of their dominions and kingdoms." And again:—"By the same authority of these presents, we do absolve and set free all persons, as well jointly as severally, from any such oath (of allegiance), and from all duty whatsoever in regard of dominion, fealty, and obedience, and do charge and forbid all and every of them, that they do not dare to obey them, or any of their admonitions, laws, and commands." Boniface VIII. proclaims—"We declare, say, define, pronounce it to be of necessity to salvation for every human creature to be subject to the Roman Pontiff—one sword must be under another, and the temporal authority must be subject to the spiritual power—and hence, if the earthly power doth go astray, it must be judged by the spiritual power." Leo X., in his Bull, read and approved in the Lateran Council, says, "We do renew and approve that holy Constitution, with approbation of the present holy Council;" and Baronius holds "that all do assent to it, so that none dissenteth who doth not by discord fall from the Church;" and another of these documents puts the crowning glory on the head of his Holiness: "Our Lord God, the Pope: another God upon earth; King of kings and Lord of lords. The same is the dominion of God and the Pope. To believe that our Lord God the Pope might not decree as he decreed, it were a matter of heresy. The power of the Pope is greater than all created power, and extends itself to things celestial, terrestrial, and infernal. The Pope doth whatsoever things he listeth, even things unlawful, and is more than God." The oath taken by the Popish Bishops contains this principle of absolute supremacy. "I, N——, from this hour will be faithful to my Lord N——, Pope, and his successors; the counsel that they shall deliver to me I will reveal to no one, to their damage. I will be their helper in retaining the Papacy, and royalties of St. Peter, and I will defend them against every man. I will be careful to preserve, defend, and promote the rights, honours, privileges and authority of the Pope. I will not be (a party) in any counsel, deed, or treaty, in which may be devised any thing sinister against the Pope, or prejudicial to his person, rights, or power; and if I shall know any such thing to be under discussion by any parties whatsoever, I will hinder it as far as I am able; and as soon as I know it, I will signify it to my Lord the Pope. The Apostolic mandates I will observe with all my powers, and I will cause them to be observed by others; heretics and rebels against my Lord the Pope, I will persecute and attack; being called to a Synod, I will come."

These are samples of what is meant by the Pope's supremacy. It is true, that, in modern times, it has not appeared, practically, in this haughty and offensive form, and for the very good reason that the nations of the world have refused to concede it. The great national struggles of the Reformation turned on this point. Previously to that auspicious period, all that is asserted in the above extracts actually existed. The power therein claimed was exercised in all the nations of Europe. Kings, nobles, nations, trembled in the presence of this ghostly power, and meekly bowed their ignoble necks to receive the yoke so sedulously prepared, and so boldly put on, It was only after the most fierce and bloody wars; the death of millions of victims to these desolating storms; the expenditure of a countless amount of treasure; and the most strenuous and long-continued mental and religious contest, that this hideous power was shaken, and the nations, in some measure, were freed from the bleeding despotism. Has the right of the Popedom to this power ever been renounced? Have we ever heard of modern Pontiffs rescinding the Bulls, and abandoning the claims of their lordly predecessors? How can this be, with the claim to infallibility still maintained?

Does the revival of Popery in our day mean the revival of these claims? Most unquestionably. None indeed can be so simple as to imagine that the full enormity will be attempted at once; and no doubt many private Roman Catholics, in their hearts, renounce the notion of the evil in its ancient magnitude. But do they renounce the principle of the Pope's supremacy? If the root is left in the soil, what should hinder the ripe fruit again appearing, which was produced in ancient times? This, amongst the other leading dogmas of the Papacy, is held ex animo by the nine millions of Papists, now pressing for power and authority in the empire, and though it can neither be much studied nor well understood by the Irish peasants, yet it is both studied and understood by their priestly leaders, and their ignorance renders them the most suitable instruments possible, by whom to work out the design. Let this question be gravely pondered. Can this claim of supremacy, put forward by the Pope, be conceded, admitted, and be practically acted upon by half the people of the empire, in safety to the monarchy? It may indeed be conceded, that so long as the two forces are pretty equal, the independence and nationality of the country will be secure; but let a direct recognition of the rights of the court of Rome be admitted, ambassadors again interchange visits, concordats be negotiated, and nuncios of the Holy See appear on our shores in pretended priestly, but in real secular power and grandeur, and England is again a province of Rome. Let not this be considered chimerical. At this moment the Protestant King of Prussia is entangled in a war, if not as bloody, yet as intricate and difficult as the one he waged with Napoleon, by just admitting the right of the Pope to interfere, in the civil affairs of his people, on the subject of mixed marriages. We have the odious spectacle of a powerful Protestant Monarch dallying, by his ambassador in Rome, with his Holiness, on a question vital to the independence and Protestantism of his kingdom. His Holiness, in all probability, will conquer in the issue; and simply by the folly of this good and moderate prince allowing him to become a party, not remotely, but directly, in the affairs of the country. Let some such event cause our not very scrupulous leaders to enter into a treaty, negotiate a concordat, for the benefit of the Papists of the empire, and in that instant this foreign power is acknowledged, and he becomes a party in the affairs of Great Britain.

Is it not time then for the friends of the monarchy to rally their forces for its protection? England has been free, as a nation, ever since her separation from Rome, and her liberty was acquired by that event. Under the stimulating and fostering influence of her Protestant freedom, she has risen from being the vassal of priestly despotism to become one of the mightiest nations on the earth. With her freedom and her power, every thing else has had a corresponding expansion. In intelligence, in science and the arts, in manufacturing and commercial greatness, in colonial growth and enlargement, in the success and triumph of her arms by sea and by land, in all the means of physical comfort and enjoyment, and above all, in moral and religious excellency and influence, this country has stood unrivalled amongst the nations of either ancient or modern times. Surely all good men, of every sect, name, and party, who are sensible of the mercy of Divine Providence, in raising the country and themselves to so high an eminence, will unite to guard the national integrity, independence, and power? So far as the throne is under Popish influence it ceases, not only to be Protestant, but to be English. It is no more the bright gem and diadem of a free, independent, and heroic nation, but the sullied, crest-fallen, and shattered ornament of a power decrepid and paralyzed, just ready to pay homage to the triple crown of papal Rome. In like manner in the same proportion as the legislature is brought under the influence of Popish maxims and power, just in the same degree it ceases to be independent, national, and free.

Moreover, the claims of Popery and the spirit of the British constitution are as much opposed to each other as the supremacy of the Pope and the integrity of the Monarchy. The ecclesiastical system, as well as the doctrines of Popery, is put forward, and exacted, as of divine right. The head of this ambitious Church, is not only exalted above all earthly power, but the artful and heterogeneous canon law, decrees of councils, bulls of Popes, and finely woven net-work of Church authority, intended universally to pervade the world, are all held to be infallible, and consequently possess an authority transcendently above all human law. It only requires the slightest acquaintance with the history of the Reformation, either in this country, or in any of the reformed nations of Europe, at once to perceive the oppressive and tyrannic nature of this system when once established. It is only necessary for the reader to picture to himself the circumstance of an entire community pervaded by Popery, and adhered to by the people, to be convinced of its utter incompatibility with the spirit of freedom which lives and breathes in the British constitution.

The point is simply this. The Church of Rome claims the dominion of law—call the code spiritual or civil, or both—the fact is, it is such law as seizes the whole mental and moral energies of man, and of the community at large. This system of law is not like an act of Parliament, debated and recommended on the grounds of general justice, and the well-being of the subject, but it is enacted as a code infinitely above the scrutiny, examination, and opposition of the people; it is enforced as an unquestionable ecclesiastical obligation, and hence becomes a part of their religion. Now these laws enjoin universal and absolute fealty to the Pope; devotion, strong as death, to Mother Church; exalt the priesthood above all other official persons; enjoin and exact obedience to canonical discipline as divine; when unobstructed, they interfere with the property and civil state of all parties; and also under various pretexts assume the right of hearing appeals, and thus prevent the progress of political justice.

When the light of the Reformation first dawned on the nations, the noble Reformers found themselves confronted, at every movement they made, by this terrible incubus of canonical law. The rights, immunities, and property of the Church; the religious houses, the ecclesiastical courts, and the orders of monks, friars, mendicants, and fraternities of every kind; were found so numerous and powerful, that it was impossible to erect a national fabric, without first clearing the ground of this complicated mass. But the struggle was fearful, and the operation like plucking up the very roots of society. The nature of this evil may be illustrated by the state of Ireland at the present moment. By the Reform Act, the elective franchise was conferred on the Popish population of the sister country. It is of the genius of the constitution, that all such persons shall be free to exercise their own judgement in the choice of representatives. How stands the matter in reality? The power of the Church comes in and practically nullifies the power of the constitution. The law of the hierarchy is found much more operative than the law of the country. When six millions of people are found to think, reason, feel, and act alike, on all the great and grave questions requiring their attention in the choice of representatives, it might as well be said that finely-cropped hedge-rows, cut down to just the same size and trim uniformity by the shears of the gardener, were free agents. The franchise given to the Popish people of Ireland, as in the case of all other British subjects, was conferred for national purposes; but the Papacy comes in and turns the whole to her own account. In this case, we have a constitutional provision and a Popish power put in direct collision, and it is seen, that the domination of the latter entirely subverts the former. Nobody on earth will affirm, that the Popish members are elected, otherwise than by the direct influence of the priesthood. Yet in Ireland the ecclesiastical system of Rome does not exist in at least open and palpable power—in all its imposing influence; and yet, in its mitigated form, it is found to be sufficiently operative to annul, to the full extent of its dominion, one of the most essential blessings of our free constitution. What should prevent the same evil in England, under similar circumstances? Indeed, it is utterly impossible for the British constitution to develope its power, and produce its benefits, in case Popery prevails. The choice of all parties now lies between the despotism of Popish rule, and the freedom provided by the Protestant constitution of this country. It is to be hoped that the English nation will ultimately open its eyes to this stirring fact. Whatever shades of difference may exist among British Christians, as to mere politics, they ought all to rally round our Protestant constitution, not for the sake of party, but from an infinitely higher consideration,—gratitude for the goodness of Providence, in bestowing upon us a system of government which has secured to us personal, civil, and religious freedom. British and Romish principles, laws, and domination, cannot possibly co-exist. The constitution of the country was laid in the overthrow of the Popish system, and if the latter is allowed again to predominate, the institutions of the nation must be gradually overthrown, till the fair and beautiful fabric appears like a castle in ruins, inhabited by “every foul and hateful bird!”

2. THE RIGHTS OF CONSCIENCE AND FREEDOM OF JUDGEMENT, SO PROMINENT A PRINCIPLE OF OUR GENERAL PROTESTANTISM, IS ANOTHER GROUND ON WHICH ALL PARTIES MAY READILY AGREE.—Popery is founded in a subjection of the consciences of its disciples to its power; whilst the Protestant religion teaches the right of private judgement as one of its leading doctrines. The two systems are here at perfect issue. The claim of the Church of Rome to the exercise of the office of infallible interpreter of the faith, effectually nullifies the right of conscience. She requires her own disciples to believe, without even any mental scruple or doubt, whatever she propounds as an article of faith; and anathematizes as heretics, doomed to eternal punishment, all Protestants who have the boldness to differ from her dogmas. In fact, all her persecutions have arisen out of this assumption. It would be easy to fill a volume with extracts on the subject; a few will suffice. "We say, define, and pronounce, that it is absolutely necessary to salvation, for every man to be subject to the Pope of Rome. The Pope is Christ's vicar, St. Peter's successor, and hath the supreme power on earth over the whole church."—(Council Trent.) The Rhemish Testament contains the following note on Rev. xvii. 6, "Drunken with the blood of the saints:" "Protestants," they say "foolishly expound it of Rome, for that there they put heretics to death, and allow of their punishment in other countries: but their blood is not called the blood of saints, no more than the blood of thieves, man-killers, and other malefactors, for the shedding of which, by the order of justice, no commonwealth shall answer." Lest this should be considered antiquated and obsolete, it may be proper to give an extract from a Bull of his Holiness so late as 1824, on the question of toleration, and suited in its topics to the times in which we live.

On the subject of TOLERATION, his Holiness writes—"But what is the tendency of these remarks? a certain sect, which undoubtedly is not unknown to you, improperly arrogating to itself the title of PHILOSOPHY, has raised from their ashes the disordered [or routed] phalanxes of nearly every kind of error. This sect, holding out the alluring yet specious semblance of piety and liberality, makes a profession of TOLERATION, as they term it, or of INDIFFERENTISM, and extols it not only in civil matters, about [its utility in] which we are not now speaking, but likewise in the business of religion: it teaches that God has granted ample liberty to every one, that, what sect or opinion soever pleases a man according to his own private judgment, he may embrace or adopt it without endangering his salvation. Against this impiety of doating men, the Apostle PAUL gives us the following admonition:—'Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned; and avoid them. For they that are such serve not the LORD JESUS CHRIST, but their own belly; and by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple.'

"But will it ever be possible for any man, who makes a right use of his reason, to approve of a TOLERATION which extends itself to Deism, and even to Naturalism, and which was reprehended by the ancient heretics themselves? Yet (such is the degeneracy of the times! and such the deceit of this lying philosophy) a general Toleration is approved, defended, and commanded by this species of false philosophers.

"Indeed there have not been wanting several eminent writers, professors of the true philosophy, who with great devotedness have attempted to destroy this monster by invincible arguments. That it is impossible for God, who is supremely true, nay, Supreme Truth itself; who is infinitely good and wise in the administration of his providence, and the rewarder of the good,—that it is impossible for him to approve of all sects,* who suggest and propagate false doctrines, which are frequently contradictory and at variance with each other, or for him to bestow eternal rewards upon the professors of such doctrines,—is a thing so evident in itself as to render it superfluous to add another word on the subject. For we have a more sure word of prophecy; and when writing to you, we speak wisdom among them that are perfect; yet not the wisdom of this world, but the wisdom of God in a mystery! It is by this wisdom that we are instructed, and by divine faith we hold one Lord, one faith, one baptism; for there is none other name under heaven given among men, except the name of JESŪS CHRIST of Nazareth, whereby we must be saved: wherefore, we also openly profess, that OUT OF THE CHURCH IS NO SALVATION.”

* See the adroitness with which his Holiness mixes up all sects of Christians with infidel philosophies, and at the end of the paragraph assigns them a similar fate.

BIBLE.—On the question of the Bible Society and its operations, the Pope writes:—

“What now can be said? The iniquity of our enemies proceeds to such a length, that in addition to the filthy mass of pernicious books, which is of itself prejudicial to religion, they endeavour to convert to the detriment of religion the very Sacred Scriptures themselves, which were bestowed on us by God for the establishment of religion.

“It is no secret to you, venerable Brethren, that a certain society vulgarly called ‘THE BIBLE SOCIETY,’ [audaciter vagari] is audaciously disspreading itself through the whole world. After aspersing the traditions of the Holy Fathers, and in opposition to the well-known decree of the Council of Trent, (Session the Fourth, on the publication and use of the Sacred Books) this society has collected all its forces, and directs every means to one object,—to the translation, or rather to the perversion of THE BIBLE into the vernacular languages of all nations! From this fact there is strong ground to fear, lest, as in some instances already known, so likewise in the rest, through a perverse interpretation, there be framed out of the Gospel of CHRIST, a gospel of man, or what is worse, a gospel of the DEVIL.

“For the purpose of averting this pest, several of our predecessors published constitutions; and in these last days, PIUS the Seventh, of pious memory, delivered two briefs, &c.

“We likewise, in discharge of our Apostolical functions, exhort you, venerable Brethren, diligently to occupy yourselves by every possible method, to remove your flocks from these deadly and destructive pastures. Reprove, entreat, be instant in season and out of season, in all patience and doctrine, that the faithful under your charge, conforming themselves exactly to the Rules of our Congregation of the Index, may be assuredly persuaded, if the HOLY BIBLE, translated into the vulgar tongue, be GENERALLY PERMITTED without discrimination, more detriment than utility will arise from such a practice, in consequence of men’s rashness.”

Evidence might easily be multiplied on this question. We have, however, living proof of the actual dominion of this corrupt Church over the consciences of millions of our own countrymen. The case of Ireland appears to be preserved either to illustrate the true spirit of this monstrous form of religion in order that we may be enlightened and convinced, or otherwise to overthrow our Protestantism and freedom. No one that is acquainted with the facts of the case can affirm, that the Irish Papists are free in their church. A state of blacker tyranny does not exist on earth. It is impossible to discover a more deeply injured, afflicted, and enslaved people. From time immemorial, the fashion has been to decry every government and party in the state, till they found allies of their system in the present; whilst, in truth, the cause of Irish misery is of home growth—it is moral: the despotic hierarchy is the fruitful source. How should it be otherwise? The people are deprived of the right to read the Bible; of questioning the monstrous folly which is palmed upon them as the infallible truth of God; of investigating the foundations of religion; or in any way exercising their reason and judgement. By some talismanic influence, the intellect, conscience, fears, (they have but few hopes or joys) are seized, rivetted, and held fast by Popery. If the English people could be benefitted by a simple narrative of facts, on the grinding despotism exercised over their fellow-subjects in Ireland, it would stand in the place of a volume of arguments in condemnation of this monstrous system. As if to display the perfection of their tyranny, and refute all the beautiful eloquence employed respecting the melting and healing nature of the Emancipation Act, ever since that period, the priesthood have been tightening the chain, so that now the poor people are perfectly inaccessible to the light of the Gospel.

To free the people from this tyranny over their consciences, and invigorate the national mind with a just appreciation of the rights of private judgment, was one of the battles and victories of the Reformation. Neither was this sentiment apprehended, or this right gained, at once. The Protestant Church has been charged with a persecuting spirit. There is some ground for the charge. So long as the relics of Rome hung upon our Protestant profession, and our Church lingered on the confines of her dark dominion, so long imperfect notions of liberty were entertained. But, on the other hand, so soon, as the virus of the old despotism of Rome had worked itself out of the veins of our Protestantism, then we ceased to persecute, and recognized liberty of conscience as one of the unquestionable privileges of mankind.

In case the spirit and claims of Popery prevail again in the nation, it must be to the extreme hazard, and final annihilation, of this precious and invaluable right of private judgement. Every British subject who may fall into the snare of the Romish Church, becomes the victim and the supporter of despotism, and is consequently a much less valuable member of the empire. The exercise of this power over the conscience works two ways; first, in regard to the Papists themselves, who allow and submit to it; and then, secondly, in relation to those who separate from the Popish Church; in their case, the right of dissent is denied, and they are all denounced as heretics.

The adoption of the claim of the priesthood to exercise an absolute controul over the judgement and conscience of the disciples of Rome, when adopted by large numbers in the State, becomes a precedent of great importance, and so far as it goes, must tend to overthrow one of the most necessary, as well as one of the most ennobling rights of mankind. We hear from Mr. O'Connell and other Papists, loud and blustering speeches on the question of religious liberty. It is quite easy to comprehend the meaning of this; but let us ask, are these gentlemen themselves, and the millions they represent, free? Do they or do they not allow, that, to the Church and to the Church only, belongs the power and right of infallibly and authoritatively settling all controversies and enjoining all articles of faith? Do they or do they not hold, as one of the verities of their religion, and on which their salvation depends, that they themselves are bound to receive, and believe, without any right to examine, or question, the dogmas enforced upon them?

Do they or do they not assent to the doctrine of the Papacy, that the right of private judgement in searching the Scriptures, examining the grounds of religion, the doctrines to be embraced, and the duties to be performed, is a dangerous and a pernicious error, denounced and anathematized by their Popes and Councils? Every one knows that the clamour for religious liberty is an exertion to obtain the advancement of that monstrous hierarchy, one of whose fundamental rules is, the utter denial of the right. Concessions, no doubt, are made by the priesthood to the wealthy, the talented, and the powerful. But as a principle, the rule is enforced with the strictest rigour; and we have the very pleasant circumstance, of millions of men, living in the very heart of the empire, constantly clamouring for their claims, making their support the pivot on which the government of the country turns, and also increasing in numbers, wealth, standing, and influence, one of whose leading, fundamental, and even religious dogmas is, the denial of the rights of conscience and of private judgement. Talk about free institutions! How can these either be originated or secured unless the mind is free?

The reverse of this dangerous and humiliating doctrine of Rome is one of the leading, glorious, and most essential maxims of Protestantism, viz., the inalienable right of every man to exercise his own free and unbiassed choice in all matters of religion. Surely on this ground all Protestants can unite. It is a sentiment common to them all. Would not the moral and political ascendancy of Popery lead to the utter overthrow of this solid, and as long as it is maintained, impregnable rampart of Protestantism. How is it, that, whilst civil rights and political power are conferred on Popery by men professing Protestant principles, no pains are taken to raise, at least, a moral barrier against the extension of her pernicious opinions? If legal guards are removed, and this great and powerful body is raised to political equality with all other parties in the State, then certainly it ought to be accompanied by a clear and intelligible line of demarcation, between the tyrannic and pernicious principles of this Church, and the constitutional principles of our common Protestantism. Whilst Papists are yet free from the external restraints of law, and civil penalties from without, let it always be understood by the British public, that amongst themselves they are bound together by a system which annihilates the right of private judgement: that this blessing is denied to us, accompanied by the bitterest anathemas; and that it is intended, amongst other things, by the spread of Popery, to rob us of our individual freedom, by placing our consciences in the safe custody of Mother Church. Milton, one of the earliest and most strenuous asserters of the true principle of liberty of conscience, says:—

“The whole freedom of man consists either in spiritual or civil liberty. As for spiritual, who can be at rest, who can enjoy anything in this world with contentment, who hath not liberty to serve God, and to save his own soul, according to the best light which God hath planted in him to that purpose, by reading of his revealed will, and the guidance of the Holy Spirit? That this is the best pleasing to God, and that the whole Protestant Church allows no Supreme Judge or Rule in matters of religion but the Scriptures; and these to be interpreted by the Scriptures themselves, which necessarily infers liberty of conscience: I have heretofore proved at large in another treatise; and might yet further by the public declarations, confessions, and admonitions of whole Churches and States, obvious in all histories since the Reformation."

LETTER V.

THE last letter related to a basis of union amongst true Protestants, in resisting the encroachments of Popery. In furtherance of the same object, permit me to add :—

3. THAT THE INTEGRITY OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES, TOGETHER WITH THE RIGHT OF THE PEOPLE TO THEIR USE, IS A PRINCIPLE ON WHICH ALL PROTESTANTS MAY UNITE.

Of all the questions at issue betwixt the Popish and the Protestant Churches, this is the most momentous. In fact, it is a dispute for the platform and basis of either system. Popery being built, chiefly on a corruption of the truths of Scripture, or on principles inimical to those truths altogether, is naturally desirous of putting the Bible out of the way, that her dark designs and pernicious dogmas may remain unquestioned by the people. On the other hand, Protestantism being based on the Scriptures only, must be anxious to keep them before the public, not merely as a weapon of opposition to the rival Church, but as the foundation on which she alone claims to rest. To wrest the Bible out of the hands of Protestants, is to disarm them of their shield and spear, leaving them defenceless in the hands of their enemies ; whilst, on the other hand, the absence of that blessed book allows Popery to arm herself in the complete panoply of her power.

Moreover, to place the Word of God in the hands of the people has always been considered one of the most noble triumphs of Protestant freedom ; whilst to deprive them of that invaluable blessing has been held as one of the worst forms of Popish despotism. Then the contest on this question is a contest of the spirit of liberty against tyranny, not for some national territory, church revenues, state ascendancy, ecclesiastical polity, but for an object infinitely superior to them all,—the book of God's covenant, and the charter of our salvation.

We find, in tracing the progress of the "mystery of iniquity," from its earliest dawn to the perfection of its vile usurpations, that one of its leading objects has always been, either the proscription of the sacred volume, or otherwise, its tolerance to the "faithful" only on the license of the priest. The effect has ever been the entire overthrow of Christian liberty ; the reign of superstition in the place of "a pure offering ;" the banishment of all evangelical doctrine and sentiment from the Church, and also from the habits of thought and feeling amongst the people ; the enforcement of the grinding oppressions of the Papacy on the souls and lives of her disciples ; and the consequent dominion of a state of complete mental and moral darkness. On the other hand, the extension of the pure gospel of Christ, has always stood connected with the circulation of the Holy Scriptures. In times of primitive piety, it is well known that the zeal of the Church, and even of private Christians, without the aid of printing, had increased the number of manuscript copies of the Scriptures, in whole or in part, to a prodigious extent. On the revival of primitive Christianity at the period of the Reformation, one of the first and most essential objects was, to give the people the Bible in their vernacular language.

In the midst of his other arduous, gigantic, and dangerous labours, Luther gave his countrymen the Holy Scriptures in the German language. This great achievement awakened the resentiment and persecuting zeal of the Church of Rome, in the same manner as his opposition to the sale of indulgences had done before. Among our own countrymen, Tyndal, one of the first translators of the Bible, and John Frith, his pious companion, after suffering banishment accompanied by the greatest privations, were betrayed, brought to this country as prisoners, and finally suffered martyrdom, for the crime of opening the sealed fountains of eternal truth to their oppressed and benighted countrymen. This, it is known, was the fate of great numbers of private Christians of both sexes, in this and other nations, whose only impiety was the possession of some portion of the Word of God, and conscientious fidelity to its teaching.

These facts are adverted to in order to shew the importance of the question in the opinion of the first disputants. The love of cruelty and blood, surely, could not have been so instinctive to the Church of Rome as to lead her to slaughter myriads of persons of all ranks and ages, for the only fault, alleged or surmised, save their possession and love of the Sacred Scriptures; had not their extirpation been considered an essential and vital matter on other grounds. On the other hand, the confessors and martyrs of those times, surely would not have endured expatriation, poverty and want; the loss of liberty; allowing themselves to be laden with chains and fetters; to be immured in dungeons, the companions of silence, solitude, and sorrow, only to end their miserable existence at the stake; had they not felt that the possession of the Word of God, adherence to its doctrines, and its spread amongst the people, were subjects of greater consideration than even life itself.

This, then, is the aspect in which the question stood in the commencement of this great debate. Have either party changed their position? The scattered opinions of the Church of Rome, as taught by her most celebrated doctors, promulgated by the bulls of individual Popes, and decreed by minor councils, being finally settled by the Council of Trent, it only remains to ascertain whether those decrees have been abrogated, or whether they still remain in force. Or, seeing that the Church of Rome, in consequence of her pretended infallibility, cannot formally rescind any of the articles of a universal council, or any of the bulls of her Popes; it is necessary to inquire whether this ancient doctrine of the Church is permitted to remain a dead letter.

The fair way is to compare, as briefly as possible, the decrees of the Council with the modern opinions and practices of the Papacy, on the subject of the right of the people to possess the Scriptures. The general rules respecting Prohibited Books, adopted by the Council, and afterwards confirmed by the Pope, contain the following provisions:—

I. “All books condemned by the supreme pontiffs, at general councils, before the year 1515, and not comprised in the present Index, are nevertheless to be considered as condemned.”

III. "Translations of ecclesiastical writers, which have been hitherto published by condemned authors, are permitted to be read, if they contain nothing contrary to sound doctrine. Translations of the OLD TESTAMENT may also be allowed, but only to learned and pious men, at the discretion of the Bishop: provided they use them merely as elucidations of the Vulgate Version, in order to understand the Holy Scriptures, and not as the Sacred Text itself. But translations of the New Testament made by authors of the first class of this Index, are allowed to no one, since little advantage, but much danger, generally arises from reading them. If notes accompany the versions which are allowed to be read, or are joined to the Vulgate edition, they may be permitted to be read by the same persons as the versions, after the suspected places have been expunged by the theological faculty of some Catholic university, or by the general Inquisitor. On the same conditions, also, pious and learned men may be permitted to have what is called Vatibus's Bible."

IV. "Inasmuch as it is manifest from experience, that if the Holy Bible, translated into the vulgar tongue, be indiscriminately allowed to every one, the temerity of men will cause more evil than good to arise from it, it is, on this point, referred to the judgement of the Bishops, or inquisitors, who may, by the advice of the priests, or confessor, permit the reading of the Bible, translated into the vulgar tongue by Catholic authors, to those persons whose faith and piety, they apprehend, will be augmented, and not injured by it, and this permission they must have in writing. But if any one shall have the presumption to read or possess it without such written permission, he shall not receive absolution until he shall have first delivered up such Bible to the ordinary."

"Booksellers who shall sell, or otherwise dispose of, Bibles in the vulgar tongue, to any person not having such permission, shall forfeit the value of the books, to be applied by the Bishop to some pious use; and be subjected to such other penalties, as the Bishop shall think proper, according to the quality of the offence. But regulars shall neither read nor purchase such Bibles, without a special license from their superiors."

A reference to the extract from the Bull of the Pope, so late as 1824, in the preceding letter, will show that this "Index of Prohibited Books" was recognized by his Holiness as then in full force and authority. Some curious and important avowals on this subject were elicited from various Roman Catholic authorities, by the "Select Committee of the House of Commons on the education of the lower orders in the metropolis," in 1816. Lord (then Mr.) Brougham, presided in this Committee, and the object was evidently, to devise some system of united education, in which the children of Papists and Protestants might be sent to the same school. An examination of the report will convince any one that the famous Irish system had its birth in that committee. But it is only the opinions expressed on the subject of the Holy Scriptures, by Popish priests of different grades, called before the Committee, that we now consider.

The liberal and literary Roman Catholic barrister, Mr. Chas. Butler, says, in reply to questions put to him by the Committee: "It is an article of discipline of the Roman Catholic Church, that the Bible in the vulgar tongue should not be put into the hands of the children or the absolutely unlearned; I state it as an article of discipline, which of course may be varied, but it is certainly at present a settled article of discipline." Again: "The objection to the Bible being put into the hands of the unlearned is not an article of faith, but an article of the discipline of the Roman Catholic Church. There is a letter of Archbishop Fenelon expressly explaining this difference."

The Rev. James Yorke Bramson, Roman Catholic priest, says, in answer to the question, "Do you admit the common people of the Roman Catholic persuasion to have the Bible, without notes to explain the text?" "I never saw one without notes, and I do not know any without notes in England." In reply to the question, "Would you allow the Douay version to be taught to the lower classes of society, unaccompanied with notes," "I should answer to that, that I believe it is not at all the practice to give the Scriptures to the common people without notes."

Dr. William Poynter, Roman Catholic Bishop, and Vicar Apostolic of London District, stated, in reply to questions proposed to him:—"that the Roman Catholic Church considers the sacred Scriptures as a precious deposit, which was originally committed by the Apostles to their immediate successors, and that the Catholic Church has always carefully preserved it, as it were, in its archives, and has never permitted the faithful to read any other edition or version which is not duly sanctioned and authenticated by the authority of the Catholic Church: consequently I should act contrary to the constant discipline of the Catholic Church, if I were to approve of the Catholic children reading a version of the Sacred Scriptures which emanates from a body of Christians not in communion with the Catholic Church. These are the principles of my answer." And again:—"The reading of them without the approbation and permission of their pastors, is not agreeable to the regulations made by the Council of Trent." And again: "In England we generally permit the faithful to read the authorized Catholic version in the vulgar tongue, which is always accompanied with notes."

It would be easy to multiply extracts from all periods of history, as to the opposition of the Church of Rome to the use of the Holy Scriptures by the people, together with the shocking means employed to suppress them. But, as the charge is often denied by modern Papists and their friends, it was considered proper to present some competent modern authorities on the question. In the late debate in the House of Commons on the Educational question, and in a recent letter to the Wesleyans of Manchester, Mr. O'Connell is reported to have disposed of the charge against his Church in circulating the wicked and persecuting Rhemish notes, by saying, in effect, that some obscure bookseller in Liverpool, published those notes many years ago: but HE (!) was the first to denounce them. It turns out, however, by the testimony of the Apostolic Vicar and Bishop, Dr. Poynter, as well as that of two or three priests, given before a Committee of the House of Commons, that in England it was the custom never to allow the Bible to the "faithful" without notes, and it is well known that the Rhemish notes are those which are in general circulation. Various solemn and most important principles are involved in this doctrine and practice of the Church of Rome regarding the Word of God.

1. An authority of the Church above the Scriptures is involved. This ecclesiastical discipline evidently puts the law of God under the jurisdiction of the Church, instead of ruling the Church by that law. It follows, that, in the faith and practice of the Papacy, the hierarchy is considered above the Scriptures. He who holds jurisdiction over another, must be greater, and possess much higher authority and power than the person who is the subject of the juridical control. A government which should determine that, in conducting their administration, they would suppress the laws altogether, or only allow their promulgation accompanied by their own explanatory notes, in favour of their own pretensions, would unquestionably be acting above the law thus laid aside or explained away. It is exactly the same with respect to the Church of Rome in the case under consideration. She claims the right of suppressing, or of allowing, the Word of God to be read as she thinks fit. Is not this the assertion and exercise of a power over the Divine law, and consequently, an assumption of prerogatives and rights even above—on the supposition that the Bible is Divine,—the authority of God?

Whence is this authority derived? Dr. Poynter says, "the Catholic Church considers the Sacred Scriptures as a precious DEPOSIT, which was originally committed by the Apostles to their immediate successors, and that the Catholic Church has always carefully preserved it." And so it seems, by this, that the Holy Scriptures have an Apostolical succession, as well as the living Ministry! Can any thing be more absurd or more shocking than this? Pray, Dr. Poynter, did St. Paul, when he addressed his Epistles to the Romans, the Corinthians, the Galatians, the Ephesians, and the other Churches, commit these portions of Holy Scripture into the hands and safe keeping of his colleagues and descendants in the Apostolic office, to be deposited in their "ARCHIVES," and only brought out for the instruction and edification of the people as they may think fit? Were not these precious, inspired, and divine letters directed to the people; and when so sent did they not become their own property and inheritance? But now, and for many antecedent ages, this bold and blasphemous conspiracy, denominated Popery, has usurped a power of surveillance over the Scriptures themselves, and thus daringly intercepts the law of God's mouth. Well may the "man of sin" be represented as "exalting himself above all that is called God." He builds his dominion of darkness, despotism, and sin on the suppression or corruption of the truth of God.

2. But this power thus exercised over the Scriptures contravenes the law of the land. It is an axiom of our Constitution that "Christianity is part and parcel of the law of the land," and that the false and fabulous Christianity embodied in Popery, is not in any way meant, is certain, for the same constitutional authorities brand Popery as anti-Christian and idolatrous. Another principle of our laws and Constitution is, that every subject shall be free to serve God according to the dictates of his conscience, and accordingly to read the Bible; and he is incited and encouraged to do so. In fact, the authorized version is put forth on Royal authority, and is sanctioned and recommended by the State. But we find in Popery a power which sets itself up against this authority of the law, and actually exercises a dominion to the extent, they tell us, of eight or nine millions, the effect of which is entirely to set aside one of the most invaluable rights of the people, and blessings of the Constitution.

What ought to be done in such a case as this? Let us suppose the existence of some combination of men, sufficiently powerful to interfere with the right of British subjects to possess any human writings—say, on the sciences or arts, by which he might greatly advance his temporal interests, and actually to prohibit the use of these books! What would be done in such a case? The Parliament would be roused to the highest enthusiasm against the wickedness of impugning one of the most perfect provisions of the Constitution, in depriving her majesty's subjects of any books which they might think proper to possess. Amongst the foremost of these noble champions of the right of all men to read as they please, and become as wise as they can, would stand forward Messrs. O'Connell, Wyse, and Sheil, supported, not led, by all her Majesty's ministers. If the public indignation could not at once break up and disperse the rotten monopolists, who dared to put one book of secular science into their prohibitory index, and determine that nine millions of British subjects should not read it, then these gentlemen would no doubt bring the matter before Parliament, instantly beg permission to introduce a Bill, and by law secure to all the people the right to read and improve their condition, by the use of any book of science which they chose to employ. This is just what ought to be done in the case in hand. The decrees of the Roman Catholic Church, which prohibit the free use of the Bible, ought to be burnt by the common hangman; any attempt to interfere to prevent its reading by the people, ought to be an indictable offence in law, and means should be taken to set free, and to protect, in the enjoyment of the blessing, every person in the empire.

How can British subjects be considered free, notwithstanding the praise justly bestowed on our constitution and laws, if another power exists of sufficient authority and influence to deprive half the community of a great blessing secured by both the civil and ecclesiastical settlement of the State. The outcry of persecution, no doubt, would be raised against any attempt to prevent that of Rome. She may, it seems, if she will only play the hypocrite, put on the mask of religion, and plead conscience; coerce, oppress, misuse, and injure our countrymen as she pleases—but any means employed to prevent this is branded as persecution. Her whole dominion is in fact founded on a permanent system of persecution, namely, that of depriving the people of the Word of God, supported by the severest penalties of corporal suffering and threatenings of eternal punishment. The English constitution and laws will not have produced their full and perfect fruit till they put an end to this system of oppression, and secure to every subject the right of possessing and reading the Holy Scriptures, none daring to prevent.

3. This suppression, or corruption of the sacred writings, is an invasion of the personal rights of all who suffer by it. To hear the Pope, the Council of Trent, and the bishops and priests of the Church of Rome affirming that they “permit,” “allow,” and “grant,” by their written “license,” the “faithful” to possess the Bible, yet only with notes; and then that booksellers who in the course of their business shall dare to sell these forbidden books shall suffer loss, and be imprisoned; are vile and impious invasions of the rights of men. How is it that the idea of civil or political slavery can rouse and excite the British people to the highest elevation of enthusiasm and resolution, whilst the wretched spiritual bondage of millions of their fellow-countrymen can gain from them little or no attention? We are deceived by two things—disregard to the value and importance of real religious liberty; and the double game which is being played by the Popish priesthood. These “wise men of their generation” all profess to be the disciples of liberal principles. They are found the vociferous advocates of Negro emancipation; the enlargement of the elective franchise; the enjoyment of municipal rights:

and all the objects of liberty and reform enjoy the benefit of their zealous support.

By thus dividing the world into two—civil and ecclesiastical,—they accomplish their purpose, as well as blind the British people. With one move of dexterous policy they contrive to appear as the zealous advocates of civil freedom, and thus conciliate the lovers of liberty through the nation, whilst by another they keep the millions composing their own community in a state of entire vassalage, by depriving them of the right to read the Word of God. Their policy is like one of the mystic animals which are often found in ancient sculpture, with more faces than one. Towards the British public she assumes the face of a calf, simple, innocent, and harmless; whilst towards her own crouching and enslaved people she presents that of a tiger. On us she fawns for the present most gently, whilst to them she puts on the horrid grin of a deadly ferocity.

How shall these millions of people become free? How shall they be put in the possession of their rights? How shall the priesthood be disarmed of their power to prevent them enjoying the Scriptures? How shall they be so disentangled from the meshes of an ecclesiastical tyranny as to capacitate them to enjoy the liberties of the English constitution? These are questions of the deepest importance. It is full time they were considered. Every true Englishman must rejoice to share the blessings and advantages of freedom and religion—and they are intimately connected—with all his countrymen. To behold the elevation of the Papists of the empire to the internal as well as external freedom enjoyed by the Protestant part of the community, must be most satisfactory and joyful to the latter. But their investiture with power, whilst their principles remain unchanged, not only leaves themselves in the same despotism which they previously endured, but it also endangers our freedom as well. Of what real value can power be to the Romish Church, if it is only a power to propagate, to extend, and to perpetuate her own oppressive dominion? Would her victory, in this war of principle now waging, augment the happiness and enjoyment of her own people, in case it left them without the liberty to read the Bible, to exercise their own unbiassed judgement in matters of faith, and chuse for themselves the means of virtue, religion, and immortal life? It is well known that the rights they have given up themselves they deny to us; and such is the perversity of human nature, that though they seem content with their lot, and take no effectual pains to obtain their freedom; yet it would be perfectly easy for the priesthood to lead forward the whole host of their laity to affirm the doctrine of the Church, that Protestants have no right to the use of the Bible, and for reading that blessed volume, together with other misdemeanors, of a similar kind, they are heretics from the true Church, and ought to be anathematized as such.

Some startling facts came out at the last meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, on the subject of persecutions in connection with the spread of the Scriptures, together with the designs of Popery on our country.

The Rev. F. Martin, Protestant minister of Bordeaux, says—"Now I pray that the members of this society will go on circulating the Bible in France; for at the present moment the Roman Catholic priests there are doing all they can to prevent the diffusion of the Gospel; and they have the intention, not only to thrust it out from France, but to introduce Popery into your country. Yes, they wish to convert England to Popery. Is it not a strange idea, my Lord? What! is not this country the country of the Bible? Is your government not favourable to Christianity? Is your young, your noble Queen, not the protector of the Christian faith? No! never will the Pope conquer in Great Britain. But let me entreat you not to slumber, nor to sleep."

The Rev. T. S. Grimshawe stated, "During the time I was in Rome, but a few months ago, there were two Augustine Friars who had received Bibles, and the effect had been, that their minds had been enlightened;—the character of their preaching was immediately changed; and (on the principle that, when a man once perceives the value of divine truth himself, he feels a desire to communicate that blessing to others) these Augustine Friars went through different parts of the country, as we should say, preaching the Gospel, and producing a powerful effect. At length they were checked by the power of the Church of Rome, and lodged in the castle of St. ———, and there I left them, imprisoned for the great crime of reading the Bible, and preaching according to its divine contents. And further to shew what the degree of persecution is, I would beg briefly to mention, that a Swiss minister, distributing the Bible in a part of Italy, the name of which, perhaps it may be more prudent not to disclose, was in consequence visited by the police, and commanded to leave the country in forty-eight hours. I may also state, that though he had distributed only a small portion of his books—I think about twenty-three Bibles and Testaments—those that had received them were actually imprisoned, some for six weeks, some for seven, and one for ten weeks, in consequence of having a copy in their possession."

Then, as one of the great, perhaps the greatest, question at issue between the popish and the protestant Churches, has a direct bearing on the divine authority, the integrity and purity, together with the right of the people to possess the Word of God; surely no one can hesitate a moment regarding his line of duty.

Shall the Popish Church, by her pontiffs, her councils, her bulls—be allowed to assume a power above the divine law? As the "voice of many waters," all Protestantism ought to repudiate so monstrous a claim, and rally round the standard of Divine truth. Let religious Protestants, by their church authorities, whatever they may be, put forward a renewed protest against this blasphemous usurpation. It is time this was done, with, indeed, the calmness of truth, but at the same time, with the strength of conviction, such as principle only can inspire. How long shall his Holiness be allowed to sit in unmolested majesty on his throne of tyranny, interdicting the very Word of God, sealing up the fountain of mercy, and throwing into the shades of night that sacred truth which alone can make "wise to salvation," whilst the whole of Protestant Europe sits in mute and pining silence under the shadow of this anti-christian throne? It is time he was told, together with his conclave of cardinals, his priestly hierarchy, and all the abettors of his super-divine claims of authority, that his pretensions are blasphemous falsehoods. Would the crowned heads of Europe come forward to vindicate the supremacy of the Pope, not only over themselves, but also the Word of God, against such a moral demonstration? If so, let them; under such circumstances our Protestant Christianity would know what to expect from them, and also what it had to do for itself. In the mean time, it may be asked what would be the feelings of this country if the monarch, by the exercise of her prerogative, were to deprive half the community of the right to possess and freely to search the Scriptures? No doubt it would be zealously, firmly, and effectually maintained that such a stretch of power was a gross outrage on the liberties of the subject, the constitution of the country, the fundamental laws of the State, and ought to be resisted by all lawful and Christian means. Does not the fact, that all this is done by the Pope, a foreign priest, usurper, and despot, infinitely aggravate the enormity of this evil? Let Britons ponder well the fearful and portentous circumstance, that an ecclesiastical sovereignty exists, which claims, and actually exercises the power of depriving nine millions of British subjects of all freedom of conscience; and prohibits their enjoyment of a right which rests on a foundation above all human law—the right of reading the Word of God.

The assumption of so fearful a power as this would cost any monarch of these realms, his throne—if not his head. It was on account of his invasion of these rights, and his claim to this power, which cost James II. his kingdom. Yet, strange to say, a combination—calling itself a Church—is permitted to do, with impunity, that which occasioned James the forfeiture of his throne. Can any one point out the difference betwixt a secular power depriving its subjects of all the rights of conscience, and goading them to obedience by an arbitrary stretch of power, and a pretended spiritual power doing the same? It is notorious that the Popish subjects of our gracious Queen are deprived of rights, by the ecclesiastical rulers and emissaries of Rome, which the united power of the three estates of the realm would not dare to touch. Why should this monster be permitted to revel in his lust of dominion, any more than a secular tyranny? If it were right to exclude James from the throne on account of his invasion of the rights and liberties of the English people, by the establishment of Popery, then it must be equally right to prevent Popery itself accomplishing, without a King, that which was attempted to be accomplished by his agency.

Moreover, as successful villany always gains patrons in the end, so this usurpation, if permitted to succeed, will be first countenanced by politicians, and then in some form, come to be the predominant power of the State. When that catastrophe shall arrive, farewell to all freedom! Will Popery and its allies be more merciful to us than they are to their own people? If it can deliberately deprive them of the right of possessing the Scriptures, will it not do the same with us? If it insists on such a submission to its authority as annihilates all freedom of judgement, will it not claim the privilege of either putting the consciences of Protestants under the ban of its tyranny or of anathematizing them as heretics? In case this is deemed uncharitable the answer is at hand:—It does the same with its own followers and vassals: it has done the same in all ages and nations; it belongs to its system, its law, and its religion; no part has been rescinded, and there is no human probability, that in case Popery should gain the ascendant in this country, it will relax the rigour of its code in accommodation to a nation which has stood for ages the noblest bulwark against its ambition of universal dominion.

And then let the thoughtless abettors of Popery ask themselves this question—viz., whether it is likely that a power which robs us of our Bibles can be expected to respect our civil rights? The fact is, that the spiritual despotism of the Papacy is exercised for a secular purpose. The truth is withheld from the poor deluded people, that they may be prepared to offer their suffrages and support to the tyranny, the pomp, the ambition of this half hellish and half earthly despotism.

Protestants ought to combine, not merely to preserve the rights of conscience, the integrity of the Scriptures, and the freedom to possess and read those Scriptures amongst themselves, but also to insist on the principle being carried out through the whole British empire.

Here is a tangible object of assault. His Holiness and his hierarchy in this nation assert a dogma, act upon a system, and enforce laws, which deprive millions of the otherwise free subjects of these realms, of their most valuable rights, and also endanger the liberties of the entire community. All Protestants are bound, by their principles, to unite for the purpose of destroying this monstrous power. Here is a victory for freedom! Let a moral influence be created by the combined exertions of all true Protestants, which shall drive back from our shores the usurped tyranny of Rome; break down the despotism exercised by the Popish priesthood; put it out of the power of the decrees of the Council of Trent, and the administrators of Dens' Theology, to deprive the people of the right to possess and read the Bible; and assert and vindicate the claims of all British subjects to freedom of conscience. We possess the means of breaking down this despotism, and establishing this principle of spiritual liberty. Let the whole of our Protestantism lift up her voice, concentrate her energies and power, send forth the light of truth, and she must ultimately prevail. The contest is, indeed already begun. The vanguard of Protestantism has confronted the enemy: a mighty corps de reserve is behind. It only remains for the scattered forces to be brought together, and a glorious victory awaits them. The movements of Popery will do this. When under the ban of proscription, however necessary, she excited the pity of many benevolent Christians; but now, basking in the sunshine, she begins again to erect her serpentine crest, and stand out to public view in all the enormity of her tyranny and craft.

No points of assault can be more vulnerable than the Pope's supremacy, the claims of Popery to coerce the consciences of men in matters of faith, and her blasphemous assumption of authority even over the Word of God. Will Protestants sit still, and allow her to exercise these oppressive and injurious claims in the British dominions, and over millions of British subjects? To them belongs the mighty prerogative of saying to their enslaved fellow-countrymen—BE FREE! If, however, they ignominiously determine to be quiet in the midst of this rampant impiety, then they will infallibly be dragged into the gulph of despotism themselves; and they will richly deserve the fate that awaits them, whilst unborn generations will be called to murmur the funeral dirge of our departed national and religious glories.

LETTER VI.

ALL that can be attempted in this final letter, is to throw out a few thoughts as to the means necessary to be adopted in this crisis of the Protestant faith.

I. The first and most essential thing is, THE CREATION OF A MORAL FEELING SUITED TO THE EMERGENCY.—The great lines of demarcation between the two systems of Popery and Protestantism having been very much put out of sight in modern times, ought again to be made tangible. Many circumstances have tended to obliterate these fundamental distinctions in the public mind.

A general apathy throughout Europe on all religious questions, seems to have prevailed after the wars of Louis XIV. of France with William III. of England; one, the great champion of Romanism, and the other, the triumphant and glorious leader of the Reformation. No doubt can be entertained, but the moral end proposed by the ambitious monarch of France, was the restoration of the papacy to its pristine vigour and power. This design was frustrated by the, then, head of the House of Orange; and, Providence favouring the design by numerous interesting incidents, he formed the famous league which, in the end, crushed the power of Louis, and overthrew the dark designs of the papacy. In this, as in all other cases, the proud pretensions, the ambitious projects, and the crafty designs of the Church of Rome on the liberties of Protestant Churches and States, fell with the political power which supported her cruel and oppressive policy. Thwarted, humbled, shattered, and paralyzed by the heroism of William and the sword of Marlborough, Popery lay a bleeding and almost lifeless carcass for many years. Exhausted by her own exertions, and the power which mainly supported her being crippled and borne down—whilst at the same time, the Protestant nations were alive to the value of their freedom, and equally prepared to support and vindicate it against all aggression—she seems, for a season, to have been cowed into quiescence, and to have abandoned the hope of enslaving mankind.

In this period of collapse, Voltaire and modern infidelity made their appearance; so that, instead of the points of controversy betwixt Popery and Protestantism being kept before the attention of the public, another, viz. the deistical question, for a great length of time, occupied the time and absorbed the attention of all parties who considered it important to pay any regard to religion. This pestilent fruit of human wickedness, having sprung up, and presented its most luxuriant growth in Roman Catholic countries, demanded the supreme attention of the Papal hierarchy, as well as that of the Protestant Church. The intensity with which this great debate was pursued on all sides, had the effect of placing all other polemical subjects in a state of abeyance for the time. The learned labours of divines, and the reading of the laity turned very much on these debates for a series of years, to the almost entire exclusion of the Popish controversy. Hence, in nearly all our modern systems of theology, while the other great points of difference amongst christians are noticed, and have their appropriate portions of argument, we have no notice taken of the great land-marks erected by the Reformers to guide the enquirer as to the differences betwixt these essentially opposite creeds. For anything which appears to the contrary in our modern theology, whether given in a systematic and scholastic form, or in the more captivating and popular mode of oratorical discourses, these clashing elements might have ceased to exist, and a beautiful and christian unity have been brought about betwixt the two rival Churches. As these questions for a long period ceased to be the subject of even study, as well as teaching, amongst divines, so the great bulk of the community became entirely ignorant of the grounds of difference between the Church of Rome and the Protestant communions. With the absence of the knowledge of these subjects, all strong, conscientious, and moral feeling subsided; so that now these points of difference, though of the most essential and vital importance, are scarcely considered as deserving any attention, or of exacting any obligations.

The latitudinarian sentiments of the present age are the fruit of this state of things; whilst a strange co-mingling of clashing, contradictory, and heterogeneous opinions will be found to exist together. In the same mind, and the same religious body, the love of freedom, and a con-fraternity with Popery;—a strenuous advocacy of high evangelical doctrines, and the practical promotion of the dogmas of the Council of Trent; the firm and uncompromising assertion of the claims of conscience and the rights of private judgement, with the preparation of chains and fetters for both, by encouraging the extension of an hierarchy which claps its padlock on all such pretensions; the support of systems of religion and worship stripped to the lowest point of puritanical simplicity, and then a countenance given to a church whose adorning is the meretricious ornaments of the "Whore of Babylon;" are amongst the strange and hideous mixtures of "light and darkness,—good and evil," which we are called to behold. From this it is evident that the great and palpable, as well as the finer lines of distinction between the false, superstitious, cruel, and idolatrous Church of Rome, and the Protestant Churches, have passed from the public mind. How could it be otherwise, when the pulpit and the press, alike, for some generations, have ceased to give any "certain sound" on these questions?

But a cursory perusal of the fathers of the English Reformation, and indeed of their successors for many ages,—will convince any one of the great difference between their sentiments and our own, as well as shew by what means the morale of Protestant feeling and principle was kept alive, which feeling and principle were unquestionably the life-blood of our reformed institutions. On this question all parties seemed perfectly agreed. The writings of high Churchmen, as well as those of persons of dissenting opinions, equally abound in noble Protestant principle; in a discriminating classification of the differences between the two systems; and in a firm and uncompromising resistance to the anti-national and anti-christian claims of Popery. From the lofty episcopacy of Laud, through the different grades of churchmanship, to the moderate notions of Usher; from the divines of the Westminster assembly, to the Scottish Covenanters; from Baxter, Howe, Henry, Pool, down to Owen, John Goodwin, Nye, Marshall, and the most strenuous Independents;—we find equal firmness, with infinite talent and labour, to instruct the people in the enormities of Popery, and to exhibit the true doctrines and principles of the Protestant faith. Taking the published discourses of these eminent men as an index of their public teaching, it is most obvious that they considered these questions as of paramount importance, and that it constituted a part of their pastoral office to instruct the people of their charge in all the doctrines of Protestantism, not merely in general terms, but as distinguished from the opposite dogmas. Nothing short of this could have created that popular wisdom, firmness, and devotedness to the principles of the Reformation, which were so often, in most difficult and perilous circumstances, evinced by our forefathers.

Popish writers are constantly taunting us with the circumstance that our religion originated with Henry VIII.; that it arose out of an illicit passion; that he was a tyrant, a profligate, and in all respects a bad man. Did it never occur to these gentlemen, that bad men are the only instruments which Providence can consistently employ in some departments of his administration? In the work of reformation, at the period in question, the meekness of Christian wisdom would have been but a poor match against a combination of men, calling themselves a church, in which wickedness had collected all its abominations; where duplicity, fraud, hypocrisy, and falsehood, were taught as a science; in which ferocity, cruelty, and murder, were legalized, sanctioned, and encouraged as religiously meritorious; and whose despotic throne, and oppressive and tyrannic claims, were supported by machinations of evil perfectly impervious to reason, to truth, and to religion. Individual minds may melt beneath the soft and gentle influences of religious truth; but masses of men, united together to support and perpetuate a system of abomination such as the hierarchy of Rome then presented, and still presents, can never yield to simple truth. In the times of Henry, rough and strong work had to be done in order to clear away the rubbish of Popery, and make way for the preaching of the gospel, as well as the erection of a spiritual church; and though no one can say anything in praise of the personal character of the monarch, yet, any one may perceive his admirable fitness for the task he had to perform. An ingenious observer might possibly discover some points of parallelism betwixt the agents by which the papacy was built up and pulled down. No true son of the Romish Church will deny that amongst her Popes, Hildebrand, Boniface III., and Innocent III., stand pre-eminently forward as the assertors of her claims; and that amongst Kings, Phocas and Pepin, were the most distinguished in yielding her the honour she sought. If, then, the hand which demolished the high claims of the Papacy was rough, those which reared the superstructure were much more so;—if moral blemishes deformed the character of this first royal reformer, infinitely deeper stains polluted those also who are considered the greatest supporters of the church;—if some streams of blood were made to flow in resisting the claims of Popery, oceans were shed by the brutal tyrants who initiated and asserted those claims.

But to return: although Henry might be the instrument of breaking down the outworks of the papacy, yet it was by the preaching of the ministers of the day, the dissemination of books, and especially by opening the Scriptures to the people, that a wide and ample foundation was laid for Protestantism in the public mind. Nothing short of this could have originated our institutions. Ambition, pique, or passion, may induce individual sovereigns to follow one line of policy in religion, rather than another; but a nation can never freely and spontaneously adopt such a course as led to the ultimate establishment of the Protestant religion and constitution in this kingdom, but by the creation of moral sentiments in accordance with this free and holy structure. The unquestionable doctrines of the true Catholic Church, as opposed to the sectarian claims of the Church of Rome; the real rights, responsibilities, and duties of men; the personal nature of religion as a solemn engagement betwixt the soul and GOD; together with moral rules essential to the compact between sovereigns and their subjects,—must have been generally disseminated, as well as apprehended, in order to prepare the nation to adopt and maintain its gloriously protestant system. All this was produced by the religious instructors of the people. The edicts of the king; the spare and paltry legislation of the Parliament of the time; and the functions of the secular magistrate; were all perfectly inadequate to produce the Reformation. Religious minds alone seized the grand idea, and the labours of the clerical order impressed the subject on the public attention. Indeed, great moral changes of a religious and useful description, are seldom or never accomplished, but by the agency of the pastors of the Church. When the way is prepared by their enlightened and self-denying labours, for the deliberations of the senator, then the statesman may appear on the theatre, and erect the body politic on the ground already cleared to his hands. We are only indebted in a secondary degree to the mere politicians of any party, or of any age, for the blessings of the Reformation. In Germany, Luther, Melancthon, and their coadjutors, were the true authors, by their teaching, their spirit, and their sufferings, of this great and blessed change; and in our own country, Cranmer, Latimer, Ridley, Tyndal, and a host of other eminent men, laid the basis of our religion and liberties in their literary labours, pastoral instruction, indomitable courage, personal sufferings, and martyred death.

It is the fashion of modern times to decry the exertions of these noble-minded men, and, indeed, to represent all ministers of religion as, ex officio, enemies of public freedom. Without denying the merit of many great and wise laymen, as connected with this great change; and also, in a spirit of gratitude to Divine Providence, for raising up many powerful potentates to protect and perform great and splendid services for this cause of truth and of GOD—it must be allowed that the pastors of religion of different orders, were the men whose labours were the most unwearied, and who, through all the fortunes of the struggle, were most true to the principles of the Reformation. Had the false dogmas and usurpations of the Church of Rome darkened and bewildered the intellect of the nobility and higher orders, so as to render them unfit to guide the popular mind in the assertion and employment of their just rights? The educational course adopted in the Universities and public seminaries of the nation, removed this darkness, and prepared for the service of the nation a class of senators who could apprehend the differences betwixt national freedom as opposed to the enslaving dominion of Rome. Had the superstitions of Popery brought the peasantry and population of the country into a state of ignorant and barbarous superstition? The parochial and pastoral labours of the clergy broke the chains of this superstitious blindness, and gradually prepared the way for that middle order of industrious, intelligent, religious; and patriotic men, who now constitute the palladium of our freedom and strength. The pseudo politicians and philosophers of the age, in their newly-awakened zeal for the education and liberty of the people, pretend, that the Protestant Church, as a Church, has always been the enemy of popular knowledge and universal instruction. Here we have proof of the contrary. The ministers of religion were the parties who instructed the nation in the spiritual difference betwixt the slavish superstitions of the Church of Rome, and the doctrines and duties of real Christianity; asserted and maintained the independence and nationality of the religion of the country; vindicated the rights of individuals to examine, judge, and act for themselves, as accountable creatures, instead of cringing in slavish fear at the feet of a cruel and horribly depraved priesthood: and it was this maligned and much abused class of men, who inculcated those great constitutional principles on which the throne, the legislative bodies, and the laws of this Protestant realm repose. The light which flashed confusion into the dark despotism of Rome, was light from the altars of the Protestant Church. The victory was not, indeed, an easy one. To enable a nation, sunk in the grossest ignorance, to emerge from such a state, and to judge aright on questions so intricate and multitudinous as those which were mooted by this great controversy, and by their suffrages to settle it on the side of truth, freedom, and religion, was an arduous task. The writings of the day will inform us as to the real authors of this grand triumph.

However powerful the daily and periodical press of the country may now appear in guiding the public mind on points of theology and political opinion, no such vehicles of sentiment, no such means of influence then existed. The translated scriptures; the sabbath service rendered intelligible by being vernacular; the plain, and always, in the points of difference betwixt the Church of Rome and the Church of England, distinctive enunciation of the truths of the gospel; the more learned lectures and discourses delivered before the court, the parliament, and the public officers of the state—very different to the vapid nihilism pronounced in high places in modern times—in which the questions between Popery and the national religion formed a prominent part; the publication of tracts setting forth in forcible and homely style the grounds of the Protestant faith; and above all the truly soft, hallowing, and consoling influence of the whole combined agency of the church on the pious feelings of the populace;—all united to create that moral sentiment on which our national Protestantism originally rested.

This wholesome practice of the fathers of our religion and freedom, must again be resorted to. It is utterly useless, in this nation, to expect exertions to be made by the people, to stem the torrents of Popish superstition and despotism, otherwise than by creating a moral platform of operations. As the destinies of the nation are now very much in the hands of the people, through their increased franchises, and they must necessarily act on the convictions of their own mind, this, now especially becomes of paramount importance. It is, indeed, cheering to find a portion of the daily and periodical press nobly performing its duty in this respect. But from the comparative silence of the religious journals, till very recently, it seemed as if all the Protestant communities had simultaneously agreed that the matters in debate were of a purely secular and political nature. Nothing can be more mistaken than such an opinion. The fact is, it is not only a religious question of the most momentous description, but it is a question which must, and will, be settled by the Church. In what manner this will be done, it is at present difficult to divine, and impossible to predict. One thing, however, is certain,—that if the Protestant communities remain in their present apathetic state: if they agree as heretofore, to abandon the field to political men, however great, and however honest, our cause is lost, and Popery will most assuredly prevail again in this empire. And, it may be asked, why should Protestant statesmen be expected to accomplish, on mere political grounds, that which is never expected from the popish statesman? The whole moral force of the Church of Rome is brought to support the champions of her claims, and the assertors of her power. O'Connell and his phalanx retire on this power, and it is always ready to sustain them. On the other hand, the protestant senator is an isolated character, as regards the Church. He is left alone, except so far as his opinions and actions are influenced by secular bodies of the people. What is Protestantism? Is it a political code, a state theory, or canons of human policy? It may, by consequence, embrace all these; but it is a great RELIGIOUS TRUTH. What parties, then, are to assert this truth, carry it out, and render it influential amongst the population? Obviously, the Church ought to do this. When the creation of a moral feeling, equal to the crisis, is referred to, a narrow, sectarian, and partizan zeal is not meant. This cannot meet the necessities of the case. The fact is, the contest lies between universal truth,—the means of the world's redemption,—the indefinite elevation and happiness of the human family, on the one hand;—and a system of universal falsehood; of degrading superstition, and of the undying opponent of all happiness, as founded on freedom, on the other. The elements now in collision are not new, though some circumstances of novelty may attend the general points of contact, at which they touch each other. The support of Protestantism rightly considered, is neither more nor less than the affirmation of the verities of the gospel, connected with liberty of conscience, and personal freedom; whilst the dominance of Popery is setting up the authority of the "Old Serpent;" the spread of a midnight of error and evil, together with the miserable subjection of the human race, to a state of mental, spiritual, and even civil slavery. The means by which this contest must be carried forward, with any prospect of success, are, not the feeble arms which human expediency, sectarian zeal, and a secular literature, can supply. If an enlightened mind, through all the ranks and grades of Protestant Christianity, cannot either be found or created on this question;—if a firm and inflexible CONSCIENCE, resting on clear and just perceptions of the paramount obligation to maintain the truth of God, cannot be formed out of the mighty mass of crude confusion now so apparent in the religious world;—if a centre of Christian UNITY especially, cannot be discovered, in which orthodox Protestants of every name may cordially and harmoniously meet, to fight the battles of their common faith,—then our cause is hopeless, and a surrender to the enemy is at no great distance.

Who, then, are the parties possessing the means of creating this world of principle, but those who teach religion? Our statesmen, our political philosophers, and the conductors of the periodical press, can accomplish much;—but they cannot call forth the religious sentiment and feeling which is required. One of the beautiful final causes, which is immutably fixed in the arrangements of Divine Providence, is, that no human or political means can, or shall, under any circumstances, accomplish, either in the human heart, or in the state of society, those moral effects which the gospel was ordained to produce. Only let the Church of Christ, of all parties, agree to transfer the duty and obligation of defending Protestantism into secular hands, and then, be they ever so faithful, talented, zealous, and indefatigable, the cause must be lost, because they do not possess the means essential to the cure of the evils of our nation, or of producing those religious principles on which protestantism reposes. Religious men must be willing to forego much of the tranquillity which their pious feelings incline them to seek. They are called by the circumstances of the times to put on the armour of righteous warfare, against the growth of a system which threatens the overthrow of their fair patrimony, to subvert their freedom of conscience, and consequent personal liberty, and what is of much higher consideration to them, to lead to the ruin and destruction of the souls of men. The ministers of religion especially, are bound to consider this subject well. To them belongs a fearful responsibility. Their order achieved the glorious victories of the Reformation, and with them, at this moment, rest the destinies of Protestantism, and with it, of the world. Bright examples stand out to invite their labour, and to encourage the hope of success. But irrespective of these considerations, all the ministers of the true church of GOD, of every creed, are obliged, on the great and vital principles of their vocation, to come forward as the "witnesses" of Jesus Christ, against the claims of a system, which all their creeds, writings, and the pastors of their churches, have ever designated as anti-Christian. Let all parties recollect that the questions at issue do not relate merely to an ecclesiastical regime, but enter into the substance of religion. Fleeting interests, party feelings, secular politics, and angry passions, may induce many estimable ministers to stand aloof, at present, from this momentous contest. But the time is not distant, when these shadows will pass away, whilst the glorious verities of the word of GOD, the gracious purposes of the cross of our dying Lord, the paramount importance of the simple doctrines of the new covenant, and the rights and liberties of mankind will remain, and unite to form a grand platform for Christian exertion, which may, by the divine blessing, lead to a firm and triumphant resistance of the dark and wicked designs of the Church of Rome.

II. A second very obvious duty incumbent on the Protestant Church is, TO INCREASE HER EVANGELICAL LABOURS AMONGST PAPISTS, AND ESPECIALLY IN IRELAND. The danger to our religion, constitutional freedom, and national independence, being generated and nurtured in this quarter, Ireland, in the nature of things, ought to become the chosen field of evangelical labour. By a strange neglect on the part of the Protestant Church, this country has been left as the cradle of Popery. And now, nothing can meet the exigencies of the case, any more than in past ages, but the pure and unadulterated gospel. In ancient times, Ireland was conquered, British law introduced, a new system of polity carried into effect, and attempts were made to attach her to the crown of Great Britain; but Popery being left in its nascent state, it has contrived to grow just as vegetation is reproduced by the fecundity of nature, though cut down by the scythe of the husbandman, at periodical intervals. Will modern policy succeed any better than ancient, while the root of the evil remains? How can countenance, encouragement, patronage, given to popery effect anything, except its more rapid and luxuriant growth? Freedom and support given to evil can only add to its virulence, impetus, and wider extension. If, when the civil disabilities of the popish population of the empire were removed, the government had at the same time begun to augment the means of their instruction in the truths of Christianity, by an evangelical ministry, then there would have been something like completeness and consistency in the scheme. This having been very much neglected, and nearly altogether so by the state, it remains still to be accomplished. How this is to be done, may be a question of difficult solution, and yet if it could be brought fairly home to the consciences of British Christians, it might soon receive a practical illustration to the satisfaction of all parties.

If the state is so crippled and dependent upon Popery as to render any assistance to the establishment impracticable, why cannot the voluntary principle come into more active operation in connexion with the Church? To imagine that in any period, because states have established religion, they created its means, is a perfect mistake. The ancient and universal practice of voluntary support, might be usefully revived in the Irish Church. The great English absentee land-owners ought to feel, that, as their estates were conferred upon their ancestors, and descended to them for protestant purposes, they are bound by every fair and legitimate consideration to assist, liberally, in making provision for the support of the protestant worship. As in Ireland the only classes in the country parishes are, the landlords and the pauper peasantry, no aid can be afforded by the middle ranks in such a work as this. It must rest exclusively on the land-owners and the Church herself. The state having now cast off the church, as an engine of political influence and power, and allied itself to popery for that purpose; the clergy, and other true friends of protestantism, will now have time and inducements to consider well the religious wants of their country; and, if they are faithful to the truth, to the principles of their own system, to their remaining internal strength and resources; and especially to their call from, and duty to God, in this emergency, they will be able to accomplish, in the day of adversity, that great work,—the conversion of the Irish Papists,—which they failed to do in the midst of courtly patronage, smiles, and intrigues. Appeals to the public, debates in Parliament, and the assertion of their rights against the despoilers of church property, may all be valuable as auxiliaries; but evangelical labours on the spot, and amongst the people, are most essential. It never has occurred in the history of the establishment, that a truly evangelical ministry—a ministry which has announced the doctrine of justification by faith only, with its concomitant truths and privileges—has not been attended by large members of the people, and the moral effects resulting from the gospel have followed. How should doctrines which exactly symbolize with Popery convert the people from its errors? Such doctrines have largely prevailed in Ireland. Let another, an evangelical system of preaching prevail, and before the simple, clear, and intelligible light of the gospel, the darkness of the Popish superstition must give way.—Indeed a noble band of enlightened, indefatigable, and holy men, has been raised up in the bosom of the establishment in recent times, who faithfully and successfully proclaim these truths. They are not likely to receive much countenance from the men now in power, or from clergy raised to office and dignity by their appointment; but they ought to be encouraged by the Protestant landlords and laity as the true salt of the land; and if Providence has still favour and mercies in store for us, they must prove the real and efficient instruments in the hand of God of regenerating the country, and bringing it from under the Babylonian yoke.

And what should prevent the Presbyterians of the north, aided and supported by their mother church in Scotland, from assuming a more missionary and evangelical character? Their noble establishments in Ulster indicate great strength and influence in that province. It may, however, be questioned whether this branch of the Protestant Church has done its duty faithfully in regard to the country at large, and especially, in seeking the conversion of the popish population. The conservative, rather than the aggressive principle, seems to have been acted upon by this highly respectable Church. The adoption of this rule can never lead to the salvation of the world, or to the conversion of the Papists of Ireland. Surely the noble-minded, courageous, and highly talented descendants of John Knox are, in the circumstances of the country, prepared to do something more than debate, defend first principles, and stem the torrents of popish aggression. Let them determine, from their well-established churches to support and send forth as in primitive times, bands of holy, zealous, self-denying men, into the very heart of popery.

The Independent, Baptist, and other Dissenting Churches, are equally called upon by their avowed principles to unite in attempting the conversion of Popish Ireland. Whatever may be their feelings on the political question regarding Popery, they can entertain no scruples respecting the duty of endeavouring to save them from the errors of their theological creed, the superstitions of their ecclesiastical system, the oppressions of the despotism under which they groan, the frauds and deceptions of an Anti-Christian priesthood, and especially, from the dangers in which their idolatry, false faith, and sin, have involved them. By the same rule that these parties advocate the political advancement of Papists, they are bound to seek their emancipation from their bewildering errors, and true conversion to God. If their own opinions, either theological or ecclesiastical, are worth anything in their own estimation, then they ought to be the most forward, of any classes of Christians in the world, to seek the overthrow of Popery, by the Christian illumination of the people. Without any intention to offend, or to deal in reproaches, it may be affirmed, that these churches have done nothing commensurate with either the wants of Ireland, or the obligations under which they have placed themselves by the prominence they have given to their own peculiar sentiments. As there is at present a great amount of loud and vehement profession in the Roman Catholic Church of Ireland—at least, there is so on the lips of Mr. O'Connell,—on the excellency and obligations of the voluntary principle, it seems, by this, that the time is come to try that scheme of polity, in its truly independent form, on the Irish people. Be this as it may, the time is certainly come when all those who know "the truth as it is in Jesus," are called upon, irrespective of forms and modes of faith, to seek the spiritual and eternal good of this interesting part of the United Kingdom. It may not comport with their existing missionary establishments for the dissenting bodies to attach Ireland to the field of their operations; but it would admirably comport with the noble spirit in which their fathers originated those institutions, for their descendants to commence a sister society, which should have that country, and its wretched Popery, for its object.

The Wesleyan-Methodists, too, are called upon to redouble their exertions. It would be possible, by adequate support afforded from England, for the Irish Connexion to augment its efficacy to an indefinite extent. The Methodist circuits and societies are spread through the extent of the country. The places of worship are, indeed, of the humblest description in many parts of the island; the number of school-houses very scanty and insufficient; the societies in the rural districts often few and poor; and the ministers bowed down by labour and poverty. And yet notwithstanding all these circumstances, the ecclesiastical platform of this church extends through the length and breadth of the land. It is of some consequence to have a foundation on which to erect a building,—a field in which to sow the seed of future harvests. These advantages are secured, and the great desideratum now is, the strengthening of this already existing system. Detail is not the object, nor, indeed, would it be proper; but like all other Christians, the Wesleyan Methodists are bound to meet the crisis of the times by exertions corresponding with the emergency. The English part of the body is called upon, especially, to foster and encourage the Irish. In this, nothing new need be attempted. Every thing has been prepared, as if by some immediate interposition of Providence, for direct and vigorous exertions in extending the light of the gospel through the land.

Above all other things, the union and hearty co-operation of all these parties of Christians is of vital importance. They may not agree in any common scheme of operations, or be able to work one common moral machine; but they can, without compromise, afford the countenance, encouragement, and support, which the points of agreement amongst them, and the oneness of the object they propose, if rightly considered, would certainly produce. Let all parties of Protestants consider that there are duties additional to those of supporting their own party; motives and sentiments more lofty and Christian than the indulgence of their sectarian partialities; objects infinitely more sublime than working out their creed within the tiny limits of their own circumscribed enclosures; and affections more vigorous, tender, and divine, than the love of themselves. If a case of urgent and pressing necessity and danger—and that at our very doors—creates a call to strenuous exertions, here it is before our eyes. A case of danger not of a common and ordinary kind, but of the most portentous description,—danger not to papists only, but to us.

It will not be in the power of any one of the Protestant sections of the church to meet this danger, and make provision against it. No one party of Christians possesses the means and the ability of either resisting the aggressions of popery, or making sufficient provision for the evangelization of Ireland. The whole, unitedly, could easily accomplish both, and a great experiment has soon to be tried on our Protestantism—viz., whether Christians will possess piety, magnanimity, and fidelity to their principles, sufficient to lead them to co-operate in accomplishing this work of God;—or whether they will have the infirmity to remain in their present hostile state, and allow the whole to be put in imminent peril, and, perhaps, the land again to be overrun with the dark dominion of popish superstition.

It is time all churches took up this question,—not in a party spirit,—but with a view to provide means for the evangelization of Ireland. If the power of Popery is not neutralized and weakened in the hotbed of its growth, by a suitable and adequate provision for the performance of Protestant service, the faithful preaching of the gospel, and the instruction of the people in the knowledge of the Holy Scriptures,—and that not here and there, on a meagre and paltry scale, but by pervading the whole country, and carrying these exertions home to every village,—then Popery must be expected to pour its burning lava on our Protestant institutions, till the whole are blighted, scorched, and burnt up.

III. THE CHRISTIAN AND SCRIPTURAL EDUCATION OF THE IRISH PEOPLE, is another most important and essential point for consideration amongst Protestants. The Irish national system, adopted by Government, is now known to be working only for Popery. A grand apparatus of means has been established, consisting of a normal establishment in Dublin; school houses, placed generally close to the Popish Chapels, and entirely under the management of the priests; masters nominated and governed by the same power; and the whole provided and paid by the taxes of the country. The evidence is clear, that the scriptural extracts of which we have heard so much, are only partially used, and that as a mere deception; while the whole of the children are regularly trained in all the abominations of Popery.

The Roman Catholic Church is now universally represented as most friendly to the education of the people! and Mr. Wyse, the new Privy Councillor, and Lord of the Treasury, is the great apostle of the cause. What is meant by education as understood by these parties, is evidently instruction in the dogmas of Popery. This kind of education is now going on amongst the poor of Ireland to a greater extent, and with greater success, than at any former period, because the faithless folly of England supplies the means. A delusion of the grossest description is being played off on the credulity of this country by the notion that the public money is expended in Ireland in conveying useful knowledge to the rising generation. The fact is just the reverse of this; the whole benefit is given to Popery; and as that system is constituted purposely to put falsehood in the place of truth; to fill the mind with the bewildering fables, jargon, and nonsense of their superstition, instead of the simple and elevating doctrines of pure Christianity; to drill the docile pupils in accurately performing their genuflexions, repeating their Ave Maria's, and counting their beads, in the place of instructing them in the knowledge of the worship of GOD, and the spirit of genuine prayer; to establish them in a firm and unwavering confidence in the supremacy of the Pope, the power of the priesthood to pardon sin, the rights of the Church, and their duty to despise, hate, and persecute all heretics instead of leading them into the faith of Christ, and a reverential belief in the Bible,—the evil is greatly increased. This is the education of Popish children. The press could not be annihilated, its power thwarted, the dissemination of books prevented, by the numerous decrees and bulls of his Holiness,—whose next best device has ever been to obtain the direction of the education of the people. In the palmy days of Jesuitism, the strength of that intriguing and powerful society was directed to this point. No doubt this order has been revived chiefly with a view to obtain this ascendancy again. Its brotherhood is pervading the world for this purpose, and is now in the full and undisturbed possession of Ireland. It follows, that so far as scriptural and Christian education is concerned, the whole subject is open for reconsideration, and under circumstances of great disadvantage to Protestantism.

The matters for adjustment in connection with this subject, are two; first, the question of supporting these purely Popish schools at the public expense; and secondly, making provision for a scriptural system.

First, the Protestant part of the community have to determine whether they can, consistently with their principles, their consciences, and their rights, continue to support a scheme of education which is now known to be nothing but an engine of Popery. The British people have to consider whether they can silently, and without remonstrance, petition, or in any other manner shewing their dissent, contribute to the perpetuation of a form of religion which they are obliged to view as idolatrous, anti-christian, and dangerous to the souls of men. We may be obliged by the coercive liberalism of the day to do this, in despite of the authority of scripture, the Protestant foundation of the Constitution, the commanding influence of principle, and the remonstrances of conscience;—but the question is, ought it to be done tamely, and, shall a pusillanimous acquiescence be yielded to the shameless demand? If popery is an evil; if it is an organized system of sin against God; if it is a bold and daring blasphemy in opposition to the authority of the Saviour; if it is a tyrannic oppression of the human race; if it is a gigantic and diabolical conspiracy to blight the religion of the word of God; if it is a bigoted, bitter, and persecuting opposition to all the Protestant Churches; and if it is a crafty design to sweep away all the civil rights of nations, whether possessed by sovereigns or their people;—if it is all this, and the British people silently allow them to prosecute their enterprize, with their money, then to all intents and purposes they are participators in the whole offence and crime both against God and man.

Till the Protestants of Great Britain have employed all the legitimate means afforded them to crush and overthrow the Irish Popish system of education, whatever of wickedness belongs to it, attaches to themselves. We are not the active agents in this war against God and his truth, but we furnish the means of carrying it on. Is it not time that the Parliament, and, if necessary, the throne, should be told in respectful and dignified, but firm and unbending language, that the truth of God, the principles of the British Constitution, the rights of Protestantism, and our own religious principles and conscientious convictions, are all compromised and grossly outraged by a state support of Popery in any form, and especially as afforded to the Irish schools. Resistance, no doubt, would be made, to such a demonstration; but Protestantism possesses the means,—if it knew its own strength, and would rightly use it,—to make itself heard.

Secondly:—Provision ought to be made for the scriptural education of the Irish poor. Government will not do this in their present state of dependence on Popery, and plighted faith to the Irish system. The respective Protestant Churches consequently have the duty laid at their door, and ought, to the best of their ability, faithfully to discharge the debt of obligation. The church has been too much at the beck and bidding of states and secular men. Let her shield herself in her own impervious panoply; rest on her own proper foundation; trust in her own strength and resources,—and then, in humble dependance on the blessing of Almighty God, go forth to accomplish her clear and obvious duty in this as in other cases. A scriptural school ought to be provided in every parish. Two difficulties stand in the way of such operations, it is true,—the want of children, and the power of the priests.

The first of these impediments to usefulness would soon be removed if a regular and vigorous plan of operations were adopted. It is well known to all who are acquainted with Ireland, that when the parents of Popish children are free to follow their own convictions, they generally prefer scriptural to their own schools. This fact could be verified by indisputable evidence. It is not from choice that the majority of parents send their children to anti-scriptural schools, but from necessity. They were not the parties who clamoured for the proscription of the Word of God, and the instruction of their offspring on the basis of the Irish system. In this, as in innumerable other instances, they are a greatly injured and persecuted people. If Bible schools were placed by the side of the Popish seminaries, the Word of God itself would, in time, effectually remove every difficulty.

The second point,—viz., the opposition of the priesthood, ought to be grappled with till overcome; and this tyranny constitutes one of the great reasons for the measure. How, indeed, is this priestly dominion to be broken at all, but by the creation and employment of an antagonist agency. The report of the Lords' Committee on the Irish system of education, discloses scenes of oppression on the part of the priests of the most disgusting nature. To "empty" a school by one sweep of the priestly besom, is a common occurrence. For these gentlemen to take a cart-whip, and drive the children, by its lash, from the scriptural schools, is a matter of constant occurrence, and of perfect notoriety. Moreover, this instrument of discipline is not limited to little children, for such is the mystic power of the priest, that men and women allow him the use of his thonged instrument of instruction and obedience on their persons, with perfect docility. When slave-owners flogged negroes in the West Indies, the cruel oppression roused the indignation of the whole country; but the popish slave-drivers of Ireland may inflict their lacerations on their degraded victims with perfect impunity! No evil is ever mastered but by fairly meeting it; and till a system of school instruction shall be devised, and vigorously supported by the moral and pecuniary weight of the Protestantism of both countries, this despotism must remain. The establishment of such schools would, at least, intersect the mischief, confront the tyranny, and introduce a dawning light into the regions of darkness. Universal effects cannot be reckoned upon at any time; and for the present, the spiritual labourer in Ireland must content himself with limited success. But that which appears small in other parts of the Christian field, is great in that unhappy country. To instil the truth into a few is to lay the foundation of a mighty work.

But who, it may be enquired, are the parties to undertake this department of Christian labour? The answer is, the whole Protestant church. If the different communities cannot agree to support one common system of education, let them adopt one of their own. There is a mental and spiritual perversity which fascinates the heart, as well as its external ecclesiastical institutions. Nothing can so effectually counteract the hidden poison as early Christian instruction. All true Protestants of every party admit the existence of the evil, and deplore the dangerous effects. Enlightened men of all parties, must consider Popish education as a destructive moral virus introduced into the mental constitution, calculated to deepen and inflame all the symptoms of even our native and original depravity. It interests all good men to meet this dreadful case, and endeavour to rescue the rising generation from the fangs of this industrious enemy of their souls. Surely party and sectarian passions may be laid aside when two such objects as the word of God and little children are placed before our attention ;—the one offering its divine and saving lessons, and the other, in all the beauty and interest of youth, perishing for lack of this knowledge. O cruel Popery ! which is not content with fixing its incubus of oppression and superstition on the souls of its adult millions, but it must also prepare for a similar, or even a worse fate, the budding flowers of immortality placed within its reach ! In delivering them from their ignorance and dangers, it is a sign of infirmity for any Christian man to stop and ask—Is it to be done in the creeds and forms of my own Church ? The answer to all such enquiries is ;—the word of GOD is to be got into their hands, its truths are to be instilled into their minds, its precepts enforced on their consciences, its grace poured into their lacerated and bleeding hearts, its glorious salvation freely opened to their acceptance,—and then let this book make them what it pleases. If, laying aside all narrow jealousies, protestant zeal, love, principle, and property could be united in this holy cause, success must attend the exertion, and in time the children of a nation be rescued from the dominion of ignorance, superstition, and misery.

IV. It is a question worth considering whether it would not be useful to form an ANTI-POPISH TRACT SOCIETY, in which a series of papers should be prepared on the principle of attempting to convince the lower classes of papists of the injuries and oppressions of their system.

The questions at issue betwixt the Popish and Protestant parties, including, as they do, the entire range of national and social rights and duties, it seems clear that the time is come for the free and full discussion of these points. No means of bringing such enquiries home to the understanding and feelings of the Irish people, appear to be so easy as the creation of a plain and telling literature, embracing the points of difference between the two systems. As the rights of conscience, respect for private opinion, religious and civil liberty, as well as all the elements and means of social order and elevation, are on the side of Protestants, it is of great consequence to employ these advantages skilfully. Surely some rays of light, on these great subjects, may be introduced into the chaos of popish ignorance. The despotism of Romanism being as clear an invasion of all human rights, as it is an audacious perversion of Divine truth, ought to be assailed on this ground. The success of such an attempt would be gradual and slow. Moral victories are not like cutting down an opposing army—visible and obvious, but grow from conviction, and develope themselves in individual wisdom, piety, and patriotism.

What the issue of this great contest now going on, may be, it is impossible to predict. The event is in the hands of an all-wise Providence ; but whether he may settle it in mercy or in judgement, no one can tell. The aspect of events alternates in a singular manner. Protestant power is greatly on the increase, but at present Popery appears to be far a-head. Were it not for the growing spirit of the Reformation, no rational hope could be indulged ; and even as it is, we have numerous indications of the displeasure of GOD—sufficient, indeed, to produce fear for the destinies, not of our country only, but for the whole Protestant Church. If a government which is weak and wicked enough to lean on an idolatrous and alien church for support, instead of directing the affairs of the nation on the old and well tested principles of the constitution ; if an insatiable fondness for change, on the part of the people, the fruit of vanity, instead of a wise adherence to the experience of past ages; if to strengthen all the old modes of profligacy, and to introduce new and unheard-of forms of vice; if a latitudinarian spirit which aims at levelling all distinctions between truth and error, good and evil; if by the intrigues, falsehood, and baseness of party spirit, men of talent, principle, and patriotic sentiments, are depressed and thrown out of employment, whilst men of mean abilities, of no fixed and steady principles, and of easy character as regards religion, are put forward, rather as the puppets of faction than as the chosen depositories of the nation's honour;—if these are signs of the displeasure of Providence, then they abundantly exist. Since the period of sensible and miraculous interposition, Providence indicates His approval or displeasure by giving to nations wise or foolish rulers; by placing persons of integrity, virtue, and religion at the head of its affairs, or by allowing these posts to be occupied by profligate, vainglorious, and irreligious men; by enabling the legislative and governing powers to act on the immutable maxims of truth, justice, and liberty, or by permitting them to exercise their high functions on the footing of some crude, baseless expediency. And, moreover, when Providence favours a nation, He gives the authorities the affectionate confidence, loyal allegiance, and devoted services of the people;—when he manifests his displeasure, it is by suffering the passions of the populace to rise like the billows of the ocean in restless dissatisfaction and angry revenge. Which side of the picture is the one now before us, need not be argued;—it is obvious to the senses of all, except blind partizans.

In the mean time, it becomes all who have the interests of religion and of their country at heart, to exert themselves to prevent the catastrophe which, without such exertions, most assuredly awaits us. Let the truth be vindicated and upheld; let all parties take their stand on the religion of the bible; let the noble principles of the Reformation be again affirmed; let efforts be made to place before the public mind the great hazard to which their religious and personal liberties are exposed; let the church and the senate unite in simultaneous exertions to meet the danger at our doors; above all things, let us have no more puerile bandying of compliments; but, let every man assert his sentiments and take his side. No one need fear the issue, if the combatants can be disentangled, and the great questions in debate be brought out to public view. A church with the Bible need not fear a church without the Bible, if she rest in its truth, and employ it as her shield.

82

0011.00

BW369

.D5